At the Victory Arch, veterans of the Civil and Spanish-American Wars paid tribute to the new veterans of the World's Greatest War, while the unity of the Allies was expressed by the presence in line of a company of Australian troops. The friendship between the Americans and Australians was well evidenced by the acclaim which greeted this small group from the antipodes, while up-State regiments found their welcome as free and joyous as that accorded to the regiments recruited in the city. Fathers and mothers, little sisters and brothers lining the curb and filling the grand stands, were proud and happy, sometimes happier than proud, sometimes more of both.

PEACE MAKING HALTED

French Reparation Demands Force—Plenary Session of Conference

TWO things gave a new impetus to the deliberation of the Peace Conference in Paris in the week beginning March 24. The sudden turning of Hungary to Bolshevism, although not unexpected, demonstrated the necessity for an early conclusion of peace, while the Italian demands for Fiume, coupled with her threat of a separate peace with Austria, made it evident that the plan to settle first with Germany would be abandoned. Consequently on March 25 it was announced that the plan for an early peace with Germany had been changed, and that all efforts were being consolidated, and all the information available being prepared for a single treaty of peace to cover all of the Central Empire groups and other opponents, and to establish in one document all the questions of boundary and reparation and international relations which have kept the Peace Conference Commissions busy since December.

France is insistent upon the neutralizing of the Rhine, the cession of Fiume to the Jugoslavs and the creation of an independent Austria, separate from Germany. Italy will not cede Fiume and says France must take her chances with Germany, favoring the inclusion of Austria in Germany lest, otherwise, Austria might combine with Hungary or Jugoslavia or both in a great Danube confederation, more dangerous to Italy than the Austria of pre-war days. It is the composition of conflicting viewpoints such as these that is delaying peace and taxing the skill of President Wilson and Premier Lloyd George.

Meantime, irritation at the delay of peace is spreading throughout the world and Austria is said to be on the verge of a collapse into Bolshevism.

The week was marked by persistent rumors from Paris of agreements almost reached but not quite achieved. The "Big Four," President Wilson and Premiers Lloyd George, Clemenceau and Orlando, were in daily conference, determined to reach a basis for peace, but the correspondents reported on March 30 that the whole matter had been referred to the Peace Conference and that the week had been practically wasted, except for a revision of the League of Nations plan which was about ready for presentation, but which included neither the amendment drafted by President Wilson to safeguard the Monroe Doctrine, nor the provision sought by the Japanese to protect their people from racial discrimination. The President was said to intend to present his amendment to the plenary session of the Conference.

The main snag in the channel of progress proved to be that of reparation. The total chargeable against Germany was carefully estimated and approximated $45,000,000,000. This, was an impossible figure. It was shown that Germany might pay as much as $30,000,000,000 in a term of years, and this sum was agreed on, the belligerents accepting shares in proportion to their estimates of damage on which the $45,000,000,000 total was based.

This agreement promised progress, but the French immediately demanded the Saar coal basin, adjoining Lorraine, as reparation for the French mines destroyed by the Germans. This demand was considered as annexation, pure and simple, by Lloyd George and President Wilson, but on March 30 they were reported to be willing to agree to French economic control of the valley for a term of years. The population is German.

There was a rumor that the President, on whom all parties appeared to depend for an expeditious peace, might come home and let the European statesmen thrash out their difficulties alone.

General Mangin was chosen on March 27 to command Allied forces in the Balkans and Austria. This appointment was held to presage effective military action against the Bolshevists in Hungary and possibly also in Russia. General Pilsudski, in command of Poland's army of 500,000 trained men, as yet scarcely touched with Bolshevism, has declared that, with adequate equipment, he could protect Poland from all her foes. President Wilson has consistently opposed military action against the Reds, while Premier Lloyd George has said that Bolshevism could not be defeated by guns.

It was reported on March 31 that the plan for Allied military action against or in resistance to Bolshevism contemplated the establishment of a line from the Baltic to the Black Sea. The Allies were reported on March 29 to have demanded the resignation of the Hungarian Soviet Government and the election of a National Assembly under the supervision of Allied troops.

Bela Kun, the new Bolshevist Foreign Minister of Hungary, who, on March 19, boasted of the achievements of his government in socializing industry and property, is reported to have modified his bellicose attitude toward the Entente, declaring Hungary to be in good relations with the Allies.

Marshal Foch has demanded of the German Government passage through East Prussia, from Danzig to Poland, for General Haller's Polish Divisions, which had been with the French army in France. The German Government replied that it could not take the responsibility of permitting the Poles to land at Danzig, but that it would permit and facilitate a landing at Stetin, Koenigsberg, Memel or Libau. The German Government, on March 31, appeared determined to resist the recognition of any Polish claim to the port of Danzig, either by permitting Haller's troops to land there or otherwise, while the Polish Government, which had been definitely recognized as an Ally, was equally determined to secure the free outlet to the sea promised in the fourteen points.

The first Allied food ship reached Germany on March 27, being received with rejoicing as an earnest of the fulfilment of the Allied promise to relieve German hunger.

The Week in the World's News

Hughes and Root See Flaws in League. Former Justice Charles E. Hughes, on March 26, addressed the Union League Club in New York, declaring that Article X of the proposed plan of the League of Nations, in which territory and independence of members of the League are guaranteed by all the signers of the Covenant would be more inclined to breed war than to promote peace. He said the guarantee made no allowance for changes which might later prove advisable, and that it attempted to set bounds to dynamic national forces which could not be confined. He would amend the plan by requiring unanimity of decision, by limiting the field of the League's activities so as to leave no doubt that the internal concerns of States were not embraced, by providing that no foreign power should acquire possessions on or near the American continent, but that American nations should settle all primarily American questions, by omitting the guarantee of Article X, by providing that no member of the League should become a mandatory without its consent and that no foreign power should become a mandatory for any American people, and by providing that members of the League may withdraw on a specified notice.

Former Senator and Secretary of State Elihu Root, on March 30, in a long letter to Chairman Hays of the Republican National Committee, suggested six amendments to the League of Nations plan as originally proposed. He would limit arbitration to justiciable disputes and define these, would provide for subsequent conferences for the codification of international law, would reserve the Monroe Doctrine and immigration from League control, would permit any nation to terminate the covenant after five years, would make certain the limitation of armaments and would provide for revision of the covenant within five or ten years.

Premier Lloyd George contributed to the Manchester Guardian for a special League of Peace number an article in which he said: "By their own readiness to make sacrifices on its behalf America and Great Britain, who have taken such a lead in promoting this beneficent scheme, must give practical demonstration of their belief in it."

Kaiser Prefers Suicide to Trial. In a long interview with the Kaiser, published in the New York Times, on March 30, the former ruler was quoted as declaring that he would commit suicide rather than suffer the indignity of a trial. He asserted his personal innocence of war guilt, assuring the correspondent that he was nothing but a puppet in the hands of his ministers and generals. He deplored the Lusitania's sinking and the execution of Miss Cavell, and blamed the Russian Government for the war, declaring that the Russian General Staff mobilized the armies of the Czar contrary to the orders of Nicholas. He justified Germany's march through Belgium and said that the sufferings of that little country were due to her resistance, and to the attempts of francs-tireurs to destroy German morale.

The Easter Message

NEXT week is Easter Week. In next week's issue Dr. Chas. M. Sheldon tells, as only he can tell, the story of Peter's awakening and commission for service, Dr. Alva M. Kerr marks out the "Princely Path to Peace," and Miss Sangster brings an Easter message in prose and verse.

Next week also Secretary of the Navy Daniels declaring that "Today the world in travail looks to the Church as the representative of the Living God" pleads for a League of Churches.

Next week, too, we show in its last review the once endless procession of the victims of Old King Alcohol.

We are all interested in the new Christian Herald Orphanage at Jerusalem. In next week's Rotogravure spread we bring it to you.

Into Germany

By Margaret E. Sangster

I HADN'T expected to go to Germany when I left New York in December. Germany seemed as remote to me then as the South Pole—and as dangerous as a prairie fire. But when I learned, on my arrival in Paris, that my brother was stationed in Germany, the danger and the remoteness faded from my mind. I have only one brother.

They didn't want me to go to Germany at the place where the Army issues passes to aspiring correspondents. They said that they weren't sending any girls through, and that the trip was long and tiring. They didn't, of course, forbid the trip, but they hinted darkly of various reasons why I should not go. And when at last I wrung an unwilling consent and an all-embracing pass from them, they told me gloomily that they hoped I had a lot of pluck.

Used, as every American is, to comfortable traveling conditions, the fact that I had to leave Paris on a night train did not worry me. Buoyantly I packed my suitcase, placidly I bought my sleeping-car ticket. And at eight o'clock I was in my compartment, armed with a month-old magazine and a box of tiny cakes, and ready for the journey.

The train should have left the station at eight o'clock. But it didn't. At nine o'clock it was still there, and at nine-thirty. And when at last it did pull out it moved jerkily, as if with an effort. But I, not knowing that French trains are often thirty-six hours late on a day trip, opened my magazine and bit cheerfully into a little cake.

I was apparently the only woman on the train. As they had told me at the Press Bureau, there weren't any girls going into Germany. But I didn't mind—then. I locked the door of my compartment and lay down in my berth and tried to sleep. It was only toward the middle of the night when folk all down the aisle were swearing and fighting that I wished there was somebody—somebody motherly, with white hair and trailing skirts—in the compartment with me.

The train made endless stops and each stop seemed longer than the last one. I wasn't surprised, when the morning came, to find that we were not nearly so far along on our journey as we should have been. While I tried to clean up without water, which they usually don't have on French trains, I rung for the man who was part conductor and part porter. And when he came I asked him blandly, and in very bad French, about breakfast.

THERE is a certain excuse that is terribly prevalent all over the continent. When your bath is unexpectedly cold, when the lights in your room do not work, when your laundry is lost or your bills are too high, the excuse is always the same. The porter, with widespread hands, voiced it now.

"C'est la guerre!" said the porter.

It transpired that there was no diner on the train—and therefore no breakfast or, as I looked dismally out at the landscape that was not flying past, any luncheon. Bitterly I regretted that I had eaten the last of my little cakes the night before. I sat down on the edge of my berth and tried to think pleasant thoughts.

All down the corridor the fighters and swearers of the night before were emerging. They seemed harmless enough by daylight—some of them seemed very friendly. Some of them even had food. But I shut the door again and glued my eyes morosely to the window.

We had passed Château-Thierry in the night and were nearing Nancy. The country that we were going through was country that will, one day, be historic. It began to show signs of the grim fighting that was carried on all about it—trenches began to appear in the fields, and barbed-wire, and shell holes. And flocks of crows—the crows that haunt any place where there has been fighting—fluttered nervously, anxiously through the fields. But I noticed that many of the fields were plowed up to the very line of the trenches and barbed-wire, that neat gardens grew bravely beside the most vicious of the shell holes, and I noticed that there was fresh plaster on many a roof and wall.

There was a knock on the door and a French officer appeared in answer to my response. He carried a large slice of French bread in his hand and a small jar of confiture—which is, in France, any sort of jelly or jam.

"Mademoiselle ess—hongry?" he questioned—"Voilà! I'ave ze bread an' ze—jam. If mademoiselle will accept of it!"

WHEN one travels alone in Europe one is warned not to accept anything from anybody; one is so easily misunderstood when one travels alone in Europe. But I was very hungry.

The French officer sat down beside me.

"Here there was much fighting," he told me cordially. "The'es little town as we are coming to—she have suffered!"

The name of the little town seemed, from its battered signpost, to be Pont-à-Mousson, and it had suffered. Great gaps were torn in the homes, and what had once been an attractive inn was shattered. The streets were clear of wreckage, though one could see where that wreckage had been. But the thing that shocked me and brought the tears of sympathy and resentment to my eyes was the sight of a graveyard back of a broken little church—a graveyard that had been mercilessly and remorselessly shelled.

There may be some military significance attached to a cemetery. There may be. For one finds, all through devastated France, that cemeteries have been shelled. One finds graves that have been desecrated and tombs that have been robbed. One finds mutilated headstones and destroyed monuments. They are the marks of a German Kultur, and a German system of fearfulness.

It was not long after Pont-à-Mousson that we passed a great American construction camp. I leaned nearer to the window and waved wildly. For an American uniform looked suddenly and amazingly attractive to me. The American soldiers waved back gleefully at first, and then when it struck them that I was an American girl, they cheered. The French officer beside me laughed and—"Vive les Américains!" he shouted.

There were trenches again, miles of them, and more barbed-wire and more devastated villages. And the train went even more slowly. It was well past noon when we drew into Metz.

I could not leave the train at Metz—my pass did not permit it. So I will always think of this last objective of the war as a labyrinth of steel tracks running in every direction. Many of the trains on the tracks bore the mark of Germany—the double-headed eagle—on their sides. The engines of them were pointing toward France.

The train officially stopped at Metz. But one car went on into Germany—went on as far as Treves—and I, the only passenger, went with it. Being the only passenger in a train is so lonely that one misses even a chaotic mob. I found myself wishing for another French officer—with another slice of bread and jam.

WE REACHED Treves at about five o'clock; having, on our way, passed through the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, which looked from the train windows like a toy principality from a popular novel. Gray towers rose up in a romantic dream from high hills—gray walls guarded great piles of stone and masonry that must have been the homes of a nobility. And here and there a gray church spire cut the fast graying sky of late afternoon.

Treves is an old, splendidly built city. Some of its buildings date back to the time of the Spanish invasion, and the newer buildings are so solidly built that I am sure they will stand, too, for hundreds of years. German architecture is a satisfactory sort of architecture—solid, well modeled, firm. It is suggestive of power and a certain appreciation of the staple qualities of life. But I noticed, as I walked down the street and glanced into the shop windows, that Germany applies her architectural taste to her clothing and her shoes—to her furniture and her interior decoration. I learned later, at dinner, that the solidity also is made manifest in the food that is served. I was so very hungry by dinner time that the solidity of the food rather appealed to me, but my hunger did not keep me from reflecting that it was typically German—this having of a good idea and working it to death.

It was after dinner—while I was waiting on the station platform for the train that would take me from Treves to Coblenz, my destination—that I wandered into a Red Cross canteen. I hadn't known much about Red Cross canteen work up to that moment, but I followed the sound of laughter and glad voices and found myself in a large room filled with American doughboys and warm candlelight. And there, behind an improvised lunch counter, I saw three women in the Red Cross uniform serving coffee and sandwiches and doughnuts to the boys who were waiting for trains.

I'D LIKE to write a special article about those three Red Cross workers. I'd call it "The Women at the Frontier," and I'd tell in it of the smiles that they smiled at the boys, at the friendly hands they stretched out, and the kind hearts of them. It would be an article for mothers to read. For it would tell them that at the border of a conquered territory there is a little bit of home and the homeland. Those mothers who have boys in the Army of Occupation would be glad to know of the sweet woman with the silver hair who told me, as she served cups of coffee, of confidences that are poured into her ear—of the ambition and the disappointments that are confided to her there at the cross-roads of the world. And those same mothers would have been glad to hear the other two women tell of the letters that they have written late at night, after the last train has gone through, to tell anxious home folk that certain soldiers are safe and well.

"Those women," one little chap told me seriously, "are wonders. That's what they are! I have to come through here once a week. And I always stop, for we don't see many real women—American women—in this part of the world. And I've never seen them when they were cross or tired or when they weren't smiling—no matter what time it was or how busy they were!"

The journey from Treves to Coblenz was a journey through a night-time world. It was an uneventful trip of perhaps two hours. Alone in the compartment with four American officers, who were being transferred from France to Germany, I talked of home, and incidently sewed on three army buttons and mended a ripped gauntlet. And then at last the train drew wearily into Coblenz, and my brother was waiting for me on the platform. . . . And the hands of a clock in a steeple over the station pointed to half-past twelve.

I stood on the station platform with my brother. And suddenly I realized that I, a girl, was there in Germany, there with the Army of Occupation. The platform was swarming with soldiers who eyed me curiously, but they were American soldiers. They were boys from the United States! There was little sign of Germany on that station platform.

MY BROTHER took my bag and hurried me down a long flight of steps.

"It's late," he said, "and we must get you past the authorities—"

There was an interruption. An M. P. (military policeman) standing in the doorway of the station was calling.

"Oh, Sangster!" called the M. P.; and then—"don't forget me—"

I turned to my brother. "What does he mean?" I questioned.

My brother laughed.

"You don't know what it means to see a girl here," he told me. "You're due to have a novel experience. That chap wants to meet you. Why"—and he laughed again—"do you know what the billeting officer told me? He said that you were the only American civilian in town tonight!"

At first the girl situation in Germany amused me. For the next morning, when I met my brother at breakfast time, I began to realize that an American girl in the Army of Occupation is something of a rarity. As we went down the streets of Coblenz, a beautiful white stone and granite sort of a city, boys turned to stare, to whistle surprisedly, to murmur "See who's here!" from every side. Fresh from a land where there is at least a fair average of men and women, it rather flattered me to be the object of so much attention. I wished that some of my friends from home might have seen—and heard. At first the girl situation amused me.

But later in the morning, after I had received permission from the Press Bureau in Coblenz to go, still with my brother, into the obscure little German town where he is stationed, the real meaning and the pathos of the thing reached me. For when we got off the train at that obscure little town three doughboys dropped the bundles that they were carrying, and one of them, raising his hands to his mouth shouted astoundingly—

"Oh-h, fellers! Here's an American girl—not in uniform!"

In answer to the call the boys came swarming—lean, sunburned boys with an almost wistful look in their eyes. Some of them crowded close and questioned, "Where'd she come from?" and "What's she doin' here?" Others just looked surprised—very much surprised. A few who really knew my brother came to him begging introductions. I felt suddenly and amazingly popular.

And yet there are the elements of tragedy in the situation—pleasant as it may be to the chance girl traveler. For it's rather awful to think of those boys away from home and the comforts of home and so hungry for the sight of an American woman that a perfectly commonplace girl could precipitate a near riot! I felt a sudden and all-embracing love for those boys—I felt sisterly, motherly even. I wanted to give parties for them, to darn their socks and mend their coats. Their surprise and incredulous delight at seeing me made me realize, more clearly than anything else could have made me realize it, just what it means to a boy to be away from home and people who speak a home language. As one doughboy said to me, later—

"You can't know how we wish that there was girls—good girls, to talk to. If I was a general gettin' up an army I'd send a real girl over seas with every company—just to keep 'em thinkin' of home and' mothers and' all th' real things!"

I went through the town at the head of a procession that followed me with a breathless interest, a procession that waited outside the headquarters of the military police while I got a slip from the Town Major assigning me a room with a German family, and followed me again as I started up the steep hill to the house that I was billeted in.

THE smaller towns of Germany seem somehow more like a bit of the old world than the towns of France. The streets are paved with great cobblestones, and the houses are built, close to the streets, of other stones that seem to match the cobbles. There are queer peaks on the roofs of the houses, and quaint shutters and great wooden doors. And there are archways built over the crossroads, and market-places with the figures of certain patron saints standing benignly in the center of them.

It surprised me, filled as I was with stories of Germany's horrible campaign against humanity, to see figures of saints in those market-places. It surprised me, even more, to see the quantities of religious pictures that are hung on the walls of every German home and hotel. It is one more of the contradictory twists in the German character.

I stayed in that little town three days. And during those three days I had many interesting and new experiences. It was in the great castle overlooking the town that I interviewed my first general—it was on the road just below the castle that I was very nearly arrested. And it was in American Post Office 775, at the foot of the street that I lived on, that I learned the intricacies of our army mailing system.

General Muir, commander of the Fourth and Ninth Army Corps, is a stately, impressive gentleman. Being the first general I had ever interviewed, I am not sure of General Muir's looks—I can only tell, in a hazy way, that his uniform fitted splendidly across the shoulders, that his hands were well modeled and efficient, and that his smile was friendly. When one interviews one's first general it is hard to look straight at him.

ALL the way up the hill to the castle that is the General's temporary headquarters I thought of the questions I wanted to ask. But when I arrived pantingly at the top of the hill, when I had passed the sentries and had gone over the story-book moat and in through the great hallway with its splendid portraits and its impressive suits of armor, I was more thrilled by the knowledge that I was walking through a castle than by the fact that I was about to interview a general. I have always, since I was a tiny child, dreamed of owning a castle on the top of a mountain. And so my first question to the general was not at all the sort of a question that I had planned to ask.

"Don't you love it—living here?" I questioned.

The general was obviously surprised. But he answered.

"Personally," he told me, "I like a more modern house. Castles are apt to be damp—and chilly. But that doesn't prevent me from sending picture postals of it back to the States—and bragging a bit. I don't mention on the postals that I have to climb up a hundred steps, more or less, to reach my front door. Or that it's sometimes cold." And General Muir laughed.

"I wanted to ask you some questions—" I began, and found, suddenly and disturbingly, that the questions I wanted to ask had quite slipped my mind.

"Yes?" murmured the general. He paused—paused expectantly.

"When," I said hurriedly, in desperation, "do you reckon that the men in your command will go home?"

The general was laughing again.

"My dear young lady," he answered, "I wish I knew, myself!" And as I joined in the laugh I realized that generals can be very human.

"I've been living down in the village with the doughboys," I said after a moment. "They have—"

"Splendid morale!" said the general, interrupting. He motioned me to a seat beside the fireplace. "Of course they want to get home—we can't blame them for that— But—well, when you realize that I'm in command of eighty or ninety thousand troops, you can understand that things are pretty well organized. Take any town with 90,000 healthy young fellows in it, and then average up the number of arrests in that town with the number that we have here. You'll find out, if you do, why I'm proud of our men.'

IN GERMANY it is against the law for one of our soldiers to hold social intercourse with the civilian population. That rule is strictly enforced by the military police—very strictly enforced. But I, being a stranger in Germany and an alien in regard to army law, did not know about it until the morning of my interview with General Muir.

I was walking down a pleasant country road on my way from the castle—walking with a doughboy friend—when a military policeman stepped suddenly and frowningly from around a corner. I smiled at him, but he looked past my smile frigidly and spoke to my companion.

"You're under arrest," he said. "Don't you know, Buddy, that there's a law against fraternizing?"

Military policemen are not popular in the army. And so when a soldier can beat one of them in a question of discipline he feels that he has really lived. My doughboy escort answered with a smile of supreme content.

"Guess you can't arrest us, M. P.," said the doughboy. "She's an American." And then he turned to me, "C'mon!" he said grandly.

That was the first of a long series of similar adventures with the law. I began to suspect, before I left Germany, that I was being led past M. P.'s for the purpose of baiting them.

AMERICAN Post Office 775 is a long room with a stove near the middle of it and a counter on each side. Behind the counters stand privates who sort mail, and stamp it, and give it out to the soldiers who call for it. Beside the stove sits the sergeant in charge of the work, who shouts out, "Shut the door!" whenever anybody opens it.

They are a clever group of boys—the boys A. P. O. 775. They are college men, most of them, a in the quietest moments of the day they group arou you and tell you human interest stories of the m that they come in contact with. They tell you of t funny-looking little man who carries a picture in h watch and asks every day for a letter that nev comes. They tell you of the certain corporal wh makes carbon copies of the long narratives that sends home to a score of girls. They tell you of th bad man of the regiment who writes three times week to his mother, and of the boy who never writ at all because he earned his living back home b writing on a newspaper.

I SHALL never forget my first glimpse of the Rhin It was on a dark day that I saw it—a day with mi in the air. And I was walking down a dim street whe suddenly I came to a bridge going over a swiftly mov ing brown river.

There is a story that they tell in Germany about certain rookie who was set down on the banks of th Rhine to do sentry duty. While he was marchin moodily up and down a doughboy passed and calle out, "Say, feller, what river is this?" And it is o record that the rookie answered—"Sorry, Buddie, but I don't know. I've only bee here two days myself!"

The story sounded far-fetched to me—until I sa the Rhine for myself. And then, rapidly, the story assumed normal proportions. For the Rhine is not river to stir the imagination. It is much like any other river.

And yet when, on the last day of my visit in Germany, I crossed the Rhine, I crossed it with a real feeling of wonder. For being able to cross the Rhine wasn't just going over a bridge that spanned a brownish river. It was being a part of the proof that America is the greatest country in the world!

I went across the Rhine in a service car driven by a sergeant, who is a friend of mine. It wasn't an official trip, this trip of mine, it was an experiment on the part of the sergeant and me. We wanted to see how far we could penetrate into the army line without being stopped. We wanted to see how near we could come to the last American outpost.

It was a bitter day. And we went whizzing out across the country—over mountain roads and through deep valleys. I, who had rather neglected my geography when I was a child in school, got a new impressio of Germany from that ride. I had always thought of Germany as flat and drab, but parts of it are like our own New England states—long stretches of fields with mountains rising out of them, and softly curving roads running through them. It was interesting to notice that the white stones along the side of the road were each marked with a black line. Black and white are the colors of the Hohenzollern family, and the Kaiser wanted even the most obscure roads labeled with his seal of ownership.

WE WENT along the curving roads, through country that reminded me of the Berkshires. And then we swung into a forest land where straight trees rose up blackly out of the snow. The forests of Germany are different from any other forests—they are darker, and the trees have an evenly planted look. Here and there I glimpsed a wood-cutter huddling beside a little fire that cast a red-bronze glow through the dark and gloom.

Out through American-occupied towns we went—American-occupied towns that were picturesque and scrupulously clean. We passed columns drilling, columns that cheered when they saw that I was a girl—columns that turned to stare, forgetting their discipline. We went past a tiny schoolhouse just as a little group of children was leaving it, and I noticed that the children weren't very different from other country school children that I have seen. It was hard to believe that I was penetrating so far into Germany.

And then we left the little towns and began to climb steep hills through land that was apparently unoccupied. Occasionally we passed a soldier and shouted a query at him, but usually we had the road to ourselves. And with my fingers hurting from the frost and an uncomfortable knowledge that my nose was very red indeed I began to wonder how much farther we could go!

It was getting near to sunset time when we came to a high bridge over a deep gap between two hills. I had a suspicion that we were lost, and so, when I saw a solitary and very cold sentry on the far side of the bridge, I felt a sudden sense of relief. I think the sergeant felt the same relief, for he leaned far out of the car and shouted, as we went past—

"Say—where's the outpost?"

And as we swept down the hill at the far edge of the bridge the sentry's answer, vaguely surprised, came to us.

"I am!" shouted the sentry.

At the foot of the hill we stopped the car. It was beginning to get dark, but the snow on the fields threw a queer eerie sort of a glow over the landscape. In back of us lay the khaki-dressed American troops—Before us. . . .

"Say!"—it was the sergeant speaking— "d'you see that row of trees at the edge of those fields? Somewhere behind those trees is the German army. You're in No-Man's-Land now. If you yell—loud enough—they can hear you!"

I didn't yell.

ALASKA NOW THE GREAT AMERICAN FRONTIER

Alaskan Sunday school pupils off for a ride behind a trio of "huskies," accompanied by Pastor Penderson of the Methodist Mission at Seward

"YOUNG man, go North!"

If Horace Greeley were alive today that would be his admonition to the eager youth seeking fame and fortune or a life of service to his fellow man.

The real frontier is no longer on the Pacific slope or in the intermountain states. Such fine points of our modern civilization as woman suffrage, prohibition and anti-gambling laws have tamed the wild West, and great irrigation projects, railroads, and modern machinery have stabilized the once transient Western population. The red-blooded young man who wants a share in the fun of building up a new land—if he stays on American soil—must go to Alaska, which is Indian for "Great Country."

Alaska is the original prize package, with all sorts of things sewed up in the lining. The purchase of this matchless territory, one-fifth the size of the United States, was branded as "Seward's Folly" in 1867, but has proved to be the most valuable investment this government ever made. For less than the price of a battleship, the richest mineral province in the world was acquired.

After fifty years of American ownership the enormous deposits of copper, tin, iron, and coal have scarcely been touched. Along Cook Inlet about 1,500 square miles of coal fields have been opened up by the government railroad. This new line connecting Seward and Fairbanks, approximately 470 miles long, makes accessible a vast territory which may become the center of industrial life in Alaska. The great white silence of the North is being broken by dynamite and steam whistles. With new tin deposits discovered on the Seward Peninsula and to the north on the Tenana River, great numbers of men are being drawn northward. This migration differs from the early hordes of gold seekers in that most of the people have come to stay. The mining towns are relatively permanent.

Alaska's productivity is phenomenal. The great river valleys, particularly those of the Yukon and the Tenana, are covered with rich soil. The growing season is short in the actual number of days, but is doubled by the fact that there is no night from May to September. During the short, hot summer abundant crops of fruits, vegetables and grains can be produced.

While the farming regions and the mines attract a population that for the most part represents real settlers and not nomads, the fishing industry, which in 1917 amounted to more than $51,000,000, is carried on by transient labor of a very low class. At the opening of the season droves of men of the most vicious and abandoned type migrate northward. In their wake are many half-breed women and children. They form one of the most serious social problems of the Alaskan frontier.

Because of the transiency of the fishing villages and the tremendous distances between all Northern settlements, missionaries have to play hide and seek with an elusive population. Much of it is shifting, and much of it, including the native half-breeds who have suffered at the hands of the white man, is skeptical of all offers of service.

The missionary in Alaska can't simply stake out a claim and camp on it. He has to be a traveling-salesman sort of preacher. His traveling equipment is a dog-team, or, if he is located on a navigable waterway and his mission is prosperous, a gasoline launch.

Nature is lavish in Alaska. These products are from Seward, where the government has an experiment farm. In the hot summer days vegetables, fruits and grains grow like magic

Year 1918 Among the Churches

Smallest Membership Increase in a Decade, But a Year of Tremendous Activities

By H. K. CARROLL, LL.D., Compiler of the First Official Census of Religions

THE record of the religious bodies in the United States in 1918 is remarkable as showing, in contrast with vastly enlarged activities, the smallest increase in membership in many years. The actual net increase in membership in all of the 170 religious bodies is the smallest in ten years, being less than 285,000.

This diminution of increase was not unexpected. The sudden and urgent demand for hundreds of young ministers to serve as chaplains in the army and navy and in the Red Cross, and as secretaries of the Y. M. C. A. and similar organizations, left many churches without pastors and interrupted their regular work. The influenza epidemic closed most of the churches for a month or more, and prevented meetings of all kinds. Then, too, the death list of members was larger than usual, more than 73,000 soldiers and marines, many of whom were members, having died in battle from wounds or from disease and accident.

An analysis of the gains of 1918 reveals some interesting facts. The Methodist group usually shows a considerable advance. The largest member of the group, the Methodist Episcopal, with upward of 3,800,000 members, reports the past year a net loss of over 19,000, where it had 125,000 gain the year before. Dr. Baketel, the statistician of the Church, says this astounding change is largely due to lack of leadership in the churches. Pastors went into the war, leaving their flocks without shepherds, and the centenary movement took many others into its campaign service, and it was not possible to fill all the vacancies promptly. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, also had a very moderate increase, due probably to the same causes, and the whole Methodist group, with more than seven and a half million members, reports a net gain of only about 50,000, or two-thirds of one per cent.

The Baptist group did better, reporting an increase of 128,507 on a basis of seven and a quarter million members. The Lutheran group gained 17,211, and the Presbyterian, 38,271—a small figure. The Protestant Episcopal Church, whose growth is seldom interrupted, reports a net loss of nearly 11,000. The Roman Catholic Church also comes in for reduced gains, of considerably less than 100,000 on a membership of 14,891,321, which is 85 per cent. of its church "population," 15 per cent. being deducted for infants and children not admitted to communion. Many dioceses made no revision of their figures for the year.

Fluctuation in Annual Increases

THE fluctuations of statistics of membership, year by year, are known as a fact to every Church statistician, but few are able to explain all of them. A good many elements enter into the problem, not the least of which probably is that due to mistakes of the pastors who report for the local churches. Of the many thousand pastors, a large number fail to understand the extensive and intricate blanks they are required to fill out, and they make mistakes which are corrected at denominational headquarters, when they are observed, generally in the following year. Then there are denominations which have no systematic plan of gathering their statistics, and give no annual information at all, or simply estimates. We have to depend for correct returns in these cases on the United States Census, which has free mail facilities and money to pay special agents to travel when necessary to gather information. But the Census returns are only for decennial periods, and therefore the gains reported are for ten years, and swell the total for particular years beyond the normal rate. This explains, in large part, the large apparent increase for 1917.

Gains in the Past Ten Years

THE following table gives the total of members for all religious bodies from 1908 to 1918 inclusive, and the annual gains. Note the fluctuations in the last column year by year—the leap from 323,391 in 1908 to 818,534 the next year; from 528,777 in 1912 to 1,235,513 the following year; and from 756,867 in 1916 to 1,339,557 in 1917, when the results of the decennial Census of 1916 were incorporated:

Year	Total members	Gains
1908	33,885,287	323,391
1909	34,703,821	818,534
1910	35,245,296	541,475
1911	36,095,685	850,389
1912	36,624,462	528,777
1913	37,859,975	1,235,513
1914	38,641,982	782,007
1915	39,184,944	542,962
1916	39,941,811	756,867
1918	41,565,908	284,540

The total increase for the ten years 1909 to 191 inclusive is 7,680,621, which is little short of 23 pe cent. for the period. The average annual increase 768,062, and the increase for 1918 is nearly half million below the average. The Churches must b stir themselves the present year to make good.

A Great Financial Year

THE Churches have discovered that it is easier raise millions in these times than it used to to raise tens of thousands. They never got so much money as in 1918—money for the Red Cross, t Y. M. C. A., and other forms of war work; money fo their own purposes—ministerial pensions, educatio home and foreign missions and all kinds of Chur work. On the basis of the discovery that the treasur of God's people can be had unstintedly for His work the Churches are making extraordinary appeals fo home and foreign missions: the Methodist Episcopa Church asks for $21,000,000 for 1919; the Presbyterian for $13,500,000 for its various boards; the Southern Methodist Church for $7,000,000, the Norther Baptist Convention for $5,000,000, and so on. Wil these financial "drives" bring in high tides of spiritual power and zeal?

The United States is prolific of denominations and divisions. There are 170 denominations listed in the accompanying tables. Some are only fragmentary, like clusters of asteroids, and they come and go without observation. Of the 170 denominational titles, 67 stand for very small bodies, ranging all the way down from 4,800 members to 97. Twenty-five have less than 1,000 members each. Together the 67 bodies have a total of 113,552 members, or an average of 1,695. These denominations constitute 40 per cent. of the entire list, but they have only about one-fourth of one per cent. of the aggregate membership.

The Evangelical Churches

THE Evangelical Churches, about 140 in number, have a total of 25,137,138 members; the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox, 15,400,260; the non-evangelical, 656,099, and the non-Christian, 372,411. That is to say: more than 60 per cent. of the aggregate membership of all religious bodies belong to the Evangelical Churches, upward of 37 per cent. to the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox Churches, somewhat more than 2¼ per cent. to the non-evangelical Christian bodies, and less than one per cent. to the non-Christian bodies.

The Czecho-Slav

A Valiant People That Is the Present Bulwark Against the Flood of Bolshevism

By CHARLES PERGLER

WITH the hordes of Bolshevism sweeping down over Hungary, the Czechoslovak people are now holding the outpost of civilization.

Czechoslovakia is one of the newest and yet one of the oldest of nations. One of the new republics born of the war, it first riveted public attention by a spectacular exploit in arms. When the amazing anabasis of its army in Siberia was set forth in the daily newspapers, an ancient middle-European race, which through centuries of Teuton oppression in obscurity had all but lost its identity to the outside world, found itself famous over night. It became famous for fighting, whereas its fame in the days when it was formerly known was founded not so much on its valor as on its arts and its learning. In the fifteenth century the Czech nation was a pioneer of religious and spiritual reformation. John Hus was a Czech. That the nation has not lost its faculty of distinguishing between right and wrong and of standing firmly by the right is well illustrated by its attitude in the present crisis. This people is capable of adhering to a principle without compromise and regardless of consequences. A new standard-bearer of liberty, a new torch-bearer of culture, has arisen in the Czechoslovak Republic for middle and western Europe

Typical homes of the middle classes of Czechoslovakia

THE outbreak of the war found the Czechoslovaks unprepared, as it found practically all non-Teutonic nations. But from the start there was never any doubt as to where lay the sympathies of the Czechoslovaks, both at home and abroad.

The soldiers conscripted into the Austro-Hungarian armies went to the front singing their national anthems. They declared openly that they would not fight the Russians, the Serbians nor any others of the Allies.

Dr. T. G. Masaryk, now president of the Czechoslovak Republic, was in Germany at the outbreak of the war, and returned to Bohemia. Meetings of the usual order were out of the question, owing to the vigilance of the police, but Dr. Masaryk sounded the Czech political leaders and found that all were anti-Austrian. It was determined that he, being most widely known of all Czech statesmen, should go abroad, and so he visited Holland, but returned once more to Prague to inform himself as to the situation at home. When he left a second time he supposed he would return soon; but word reached him in Switzerland that he had already been condemned, by secret court martial, to death, and that if he crossed the Austrian boundary he would be shot without further ado. So he went to Italy, England and France, there to confer with the Allied statesmen. His first public pronouncement was made in Geneva on the 6th of July, 1915, at a meeting of Czech exiles, called to commemorate the five hundreth anniversary of the burning of John Hus, the Czech religious reformer. He then announced openly that between Czech ideals and the Austrian state there could be no compromise, no rapprochement; that one or the other must succumb; and that it was war to the knife between his people and the dual autocracy.

SOON after his Geneva speech Dr. Masaryk organized the Czechoslovak Foreign Committee, of which he became chairman. The committee included representatives of the various Czechoslovak colonies abroad, with three from America. In November, 1915, this committee issued a declaration demanding complete independence for Bohemia, and the dismemberment of Austria-Hungary. The following paragraph of the declaration, which expresses the spirit of liberty and nationalism animating the Czechoslovaks, is well worth repeating here:

"We place ourselves before the political public at a moment when the retreat of the once victorious Russian army is being used by political opponents against Russia and her allies. We take the side of the fighting Slav nations and their allies, without regard to victory or defeat, because right is on their side. The problem as to which side is right in this fatal war is a question of principle and of political morals, a question which at present no honest and sincere statesman, no conscientious and thinking nation, can evade. We are prompted to come forward by warm feelings of Slav union. We wish to express hearty sympathy with our Serbian and Russian brothers and our brother Poles, who are so cruelly afflicted in this war. We believe in the final victory of Slavs and their allies. We are convinced that this victory will be for the benefit of Europe and all humanity, and will not be checked by anti-Slav treachery of the Bulgarian king and his government."

Later this committee developed into the Czechoslovak National Council, of which Dr. Masaryk was president, and which had the full sanction of all Czechoslovak parties at home, and was recognized by all Czechoslovaks abroad, as their supreme political body. Its headquarters were in Paris, but offices were maintained in London, in Rome, for a time in New York, and later in Washington. The movement was financed wholly by Czechoslovaks, largely by the Czechoslovaks in America, whose course from the beginning shows markedly the spontaneity of the movement. They began to organize in August, 1914, even before they could hear from Bohemia. It is a matter of justifiable pride with us that our people unhesitatingly espoused and supported the Allied cause, and that not a cent for our work has been obtained from non-Czechoslovak sources.

OUR men in all the Allied countries immediately began joining Allied armies. In France they went into the Foreign Legion at the outset, and in Russia they formed companies of their own. But the old Russian régime was inimical to the movement, because it was democratic; and even after the revolution Kerensky was distrustful and hostile, regarding the nationalistic aspirations of Czechoslovaks as chauvinism. Still, even under Kerensky the Czechoslovaks placed in the field three regiments, and they were the regiments which led the short-lived Russian offensive in July, 1917.

It was this proof of valor and sincerity that prompted Kerensky to permit the organization of the Czechoslovak army, which was undertaken by Dr. Masaryk, then in Russia. It was not long until the force assumed formidable proportions, and it is the army which even now is maintaining its hold in Siberia.

This army submitted unquestioningly to the political directions of the Czechoslovak National Council, even when that council had no international standing, nor any other legal standing, for that matter. Unquestionably this was one of the most remarkable phenomena in history, and a fact which abundantly demonstrates the Czechoslovak capacity for self-government.

France was the first to give the council a status in international law by recognition, and England and Italy followed. Recognition by the United States followed on September 3, 1918, with the explanation that the United States government considered the council a de facto government, and this was the final blow to Austro-Hungarian ambition.

As soon as America entered the war, the Czechoslovaks in America, even prior to the conscription act, entered the United States army in large numbers. The highest estimate of these volunteers is sixty thousand, the lowest twenty-five thousand. Probably an accurate figure would lie between the two.

IN OCTOBER, 1918, on the floor of the Austrian Parliament, Francis Stanek, president of the Czech Union of Deputies, declared that the sympathies of the whole nation and of the Czechoslovak army were with the Allies.

The Czech deputies then left the Reichstag in a body, and thereby severed their ties with Austria; and on October 18 the National Council in Paris constituted itself a provisional government and issued a declaration of independence. It was on October 19 that President Wilson sent his note to Austria, declaring that mere autonomy was not sufficient for the Czechoslovaks and Jugoslavs, and that these peoples must decide their own destinies.

The Czechoslovak National Council of Prague took over the functions of the local government by a coup d'état on October 28, and reestablished Czechoslovak rule throughout the new nation's territory. The Austrian governor fled to Vienna, and the imperial military representatives in the Bohemian capital handed over their authority to Dr. Karel Kramar as local head of the national council. The Austrian imperial symbols were removed from public buildings, imperial proclamations were destroyed and the city officials took the oath of allegiance to the new republic.

At the same time Czechoslovak delegates were conferring with Dr. Edward Benes in Switzerland, and as a result the National Assembly was summoned to meet in Prague on November 14. There the new Czechoslovak Republic was formally proclaimed, Dr. Masaryk was unanimously elected its president and Dr. Benes was confirmed as Minister of Foreign Affairs, with General Milan Stefanik as Minist of War.

There was no time for elections to the Nation Assembly, and the Constitutent Convention cann meet until after the Peace Conference has definitel determined the boundaries. Consequently, basin representation on the number of votes each party ha received in the last election to the Austrian Reich tag, the Czechslovak parties delegated a propo tionate number of members to the National Assembl The authority of this assembly, as well as of the cabi net chosen by it, was accepted unhesitatingly by united nation.

It is too early to discuss details of the constitution but in a general way it can be said with certaint that it will be a very democratic government, wit complete freedom of conscience and religion, as wel as freedom of speech and the right of assembly an petition. Women will be placed on a footing of politi cal equality with men. Even now eight members o the National Assembly are women.

The rights of minorities will be safeguarded. Eve the Germans of Bohemia realize this; and it is wort recording here that they invited President Masary and Prime Minister Kramar to attend a gala performance, on January 2, in the German theatre o Prague.

Nor is there any anti-Semitism among the Czechoslovaks. As an evidence of this it is noteworthy tha when, in December, 1918, it was decided by the Czechoslovak government that all foreigners must leave the republic, owing to lack of food, this decision was not applied to the Galician Jewish refugees, who were of course foreigners in Bohemia. Two members of the present government (Dr. Winter and Dr. Stransky) are Jews; and there are Jews in the National Assembly.

In spite of the Germanizing methods of the old régime, the Czechs stood highest in culture and education among the nationalities of the former Austro-Hungarian Empire. Of 8,439 immigrants who came to America in 1912 there were only 75 illiterates, less than one per cent. In Bohemia the percentage of illiteracy is less than two per cent. Wherever the Austrian government refused to erect schools, they were built and maintained from a fund gathered by popular Czech subscription, for our people demand education at whatever cost; and although there is now but one university, that in Prague, the erection of another in Erno has been for a generation one of the demands of all Czech political parties. There seems to be no doubt that a new institution there is only a question of a short time. The Slovaks, who suffered under Magyar rule even more than the Czechs under the rule of Vienna, not only have no university, but have not even secondary schools; and it may be predicted confidently that Pressburg will see soon the establishment of a university for Slovakia, of which it is the capital.

No modern state is self-sufficient. No manufacturing country has within its boundaries all needed raw materials. But in so far as any state can be self-sustaining under modern conditions, the Czechoslovak Republic will be able to stand on its own feet. Of the coal found in what we used to know as Austria, 83 per cent. is mined in Bohemian lands, and 60 per cent. of the iron. In 1913 one-third of the iron, gold and silver mined in Hungary was mined in Slovakia. Czech agriculture is well developed, and 38 per cent. of the Austrian grain lands are in Bohemia. The climate is moderate and the soil generally fertile.

Bohemia is famous for its glassware, and this industry alone employs 50,000 workers. Pottery, porcelain and the cutting of precious stones give employment to thousands of other workers. Spinning and weaving are extensive and the manufactures of lace, ribbons, metal and woodwork, chemical products and other branches of skilled industry, are highly developed.

Fill Every Room

In April With These Germ=Destroying Fumes

You fumigate rooms after sickness, but that sn't enough. Do it also at house-cleaning time.

The shut-in months accumulate germs, as well as dust and dirt. There is little sunshine to destroy them.

Make your home really clean—your sleeping rooms in particular. Soap and water remove visible dirt, but not the germs which lurk in fabrics and in crevices.

Scientific cleaning, as in Pullman cars, includes gas fumigation.

Formaldehyde gas is the way to make rooms aseptic. Shut and seal the room, then light a B&B Formaldehyde Fumigator and leave the room closed a few hours.

Remove only the live plants. Formaldehyde will injure nothing else.

Open the beds and the closets—let the gas reach everywhere. Then you may feel that you live and sleep in rooms that are free from germs.

Be Careful in Moving

Don't occupy a home which others have occupied without this fumigation applied to every room. You don't know what diseases have been there. You do know that germs exist. Do your own fumigation to be sure about it. Landlords may not be as careful.

Do It Efficiently

B&B Formaldehyde Fumigators accord with Government standards. They are twice as efficient as some consider necessary, but you cannot be too sure.

For safety's sake get the B&B. They come in sizes for all ordinary rooms. Tell your druggist the size of each room and he will supply sizes accordingly. The average cost is one dollar per room.

The Battle With Temptation

A Lenten Meditation for a Communion Service

*By REV. FRANK E. HENRY

TEXT—Mark 14 : 38. "Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation."

WE DO not often think of Gethsemane as the Valley of Temptation. The Garden of Grief is rather a place of prayer. If we seek among the events of Jesus' life for a time of trial, we find it on the Mount of Temptation. Here, after the baptism of our Lord by John, and the departure into the wilderness, the devil appears to tempt Him.

Yet as we study with greater care the story of that struggle in the dark, and as we look back over the trials of our own lives, we come to see that Gethsemane was indeed the Valley of Temptation. In this Garden the greatest trial of his faith was faced. Alone, in the night, he battled with the Satanic suggestion that he turn aside from the path of death; that he use the miraculous powers, so often demonstrated for others, this time to save himself. But he conquered. Self and Satan overcome, he turned to his sleeping disciples with the sad reproof, "Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation."

Going back to the beginnings of the Bible, we find the same word, the same Satan, the same weak and falling humanity. Strange, also, is it not, that in the opening chapters of each of the Testaments there should occur these two scenes of temptation, the first Adam and the last? Each is in harsh contrast with what precedes. The stories of the nativity, of the temple visit of the Boy Jesus, the baptism at the Jordan—then the wilderness and the temptation.

So in Genesis, the Paradise of Eden is pictured with the masterful touch of a great artist. The creative hand has fashioned the heavens and the earth, the sun and the stars, fish and fowl and creeping thing, herb and tree and beast, and at the last, the flower of this earth-plant—man. His home made ready, the garden; and with him the wife of his heart, the first man was happy. Then entered Satan.

INTO the peace of Paradise drove the disturbing presence. On the soft silence of Eden fell the discordant sound of the serpent speaking. "Ye shall not surely die. In the day ye eat, your eyes shall be opened." "Their eyes were opened but their hearts were not fortified." God will give us in his good time whatever of knowledge it is well for us to have: but we must wait his time or be forever harmed.

Rather than rush into danger before we are strong to defend, let us pray, "Lead us not into temptation." We leave our Eden of innocence when we assert our growing consciousness of manhood and womanhood by breaking from the restraint of home and heaven. Our haste to be the equals of God, knowing good and evil, usually ends in our knowing chiefly evil. The devil promises fair and always comes to us as an angel of light. But he lights us down a steep stairway that ends in darkness.

Sin is best known by its consequences; it is discovered, not by studying causes, but by noting effects. The serpent approaches us as the personification of wisdom, and tells us of the beautiful, of that which is pleasant to the eye and to the tongue. But the world by wisdom knew not God. So Adam and Eve discovered, too late, and went out together to walk that weary road on which they must mount toward God. The way of the transgressor is hard.

Paradise lost! The blind poet of the Puritans is not the only seer who has pictured for us a vision of heavenly places and persons: though he, perhaps, has done more than any other to make the subject known and studied. The seer of Patmos, from whom the Puritan drew much of his imagery, has given us a second sacred picture of the paradise of God; closing the Bible, as the author of Genesis opens it, with a glimpse of God and heaven. Let us be glad that the earlier chapter is not all the revelation, with its curse ringing in our ears, with the sight of thorns and briers before us, with despair in the heart, and death ahead.

There is a greater concern for us even than the loss of paradise, and that is the way to regain it. Let us rejoice that God has not left us without a witness; that as a representative man led the way out of Eden and has shown us by his fall that we are in greatest peril, so another representative Man led the way back to Eden and has shown us how we may regain our lost paradise. Let us picture for ourselves the second scene, as the author of Genesis has the first.

In the wilderness of Judea, the Man stands alone. The tempter is before him. There is no comradeship in temptation this time, no twain of one flesh to stand or fall together. Nor is this the Eden of the former trial. No tree casts a welcome shade on the hot sand. No silver stream sings its way through the rocky hills. The desert, stern and silent, and the brazen sky give no sign of sympathy, no word of fellowship. It is a duel to the death. The prince of darkness seeks to keep his rule over fallen man. The Prince of Light would rescue him and restore. It is not a battle of strength but of skill. The serpent's subtlety does not now permit a direct attack, as in Eden. Feigning friendship and interest, Satan hopes to strike in an unguarded moment. But the Man from Galilee sees through his disguise at a glance. Then the attack becomes open. We can almost admire the audacity of the proposal:

"All the world will I give thee if thou wilt fall down and worship me." We pass over too lightly the power of this temptation. Satan had met many of the world's supermen and had won their worship and had given them the kingdoms of the earth.

Let us stand by the Galilean on the mountain-top in Judea's wilderness, as the arch tempter is talking. "All the kingdoms"—there they were, visible from the mount. Southward the caravans were creeping along the base of the ridge toward the hazy horizon where lay Egypt. To the east, the desert; and beyond—Babylon. Northward, crowning the distant mountains, the Greek cities of Decapolis, of Asia, of the Ægean,—Athens and Corinth. Westward, the Great Sea, and on its further shore—Rome!

Each of these in turn had held universal sway because of the genius of a great leader,—Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander, Cæsar.

Would the same vision they had witnessed make the hot blood leap in the veins of this young Jewish patriot? Why not? Proclaimed the Son of Jehovah by the Baptist at Jordan's bank, heaven-blessed and all powerful, why should he not be persuaded to follow these illustrious leaders and establish a Jewish empire? Jerusalem and Israel were insignificant; yet Babylon was but a province before she conquered the world. Egypt was once but a narrow strip between the deserts. Greece was only a peninsula, Rome a city-state. Genius of leadership had given them world-wide dominion. Each in turn had fallen before the next. Was it not God's will that Israel should be in succession and he the chosen leader? The Maccabees had reigned a hundred years, independent of the Greeks, a short time before. The people were waiting even now for a deliverer. Like the dry wood in the hills, only a spark was needed to set them afire. Then their wild Jewish fanaticism would sweep all before them.

Only for a moment did the dream hold Jesus. Then swift came his rebuke, "Worship God! Serve him alone. Seek first the kingdom of God. All othe shall be added."

History has proven the wisdom of his choice. was well for him as for us. Where now is Babyl the Great? Babylon is fallen! The desert winds ha heaped the sand in hills and hollows to hide her brok walls and ruined palaces. Egypt is but a province an alien empire, her prosperity dependent on the gra of a distant king. Greece is fighting for her life wit her neighbors. "The kingdoms of this world," th Satan promised, where are they? Gone like Nineve and Tyre!

And that lonely Figure on the mountain to seeking first the Kingdom of God, has found a things added. See him there as he might stan today, looking with prophetic vision and listenin with the spirit's ear.

Rising, as his custom was, a great while before day he gazes southward to the twilight land. The rushin waters of the Nile, as it overflows its banks, heav with fertility, silt from the hills and the mountai snows—the river brings also a murmur of many voice Not a Babel of discordant tongues, but a swellin harmony of happy words. The chant of cathedr choir from black Uganda; the song of dusky college men from the University of Khartum, the singin toilers from Livingstone's industrial mission, the Boer from kraal and kopje, the British from Cape Tow and Kimberley; the greatest of redeemed heathen all together sound the note of triumph and adoration.

"Crown Him with many crowns,
The Lamb upon the throne."

Miner and farmer, Briton and Boer, missionary and native, all the tumultuous voices of the Dark Continent are crying out with glad acclaim.

And now, as morning dawns, rises the requiem of the desert, as the wind from the east sings across the sand. From the waste places of Arabia, and the ruins of Babylon; from India's coral strand and old Cathay; from the eastern islands and the great ocean swells another anthem, the sunrise song of awakening nations; and the words they sing are but the echoes of the song from the south.

"All hail the power of Jesus name;
Let angels prostrate fall."

Brahman and Buddhist, Confucian and Shintoist, with their tapers dimmed in the sunlight, are silent in dismay.

The song from the east dies with the rising of the sun.

Again at midday, from the north—the strains of martial music and the footfall of marching men. He sees the crimson cross on the banners. From mountain and foaming sea, from battle front and conquered city, the words are ringing,

"Onward, Christian soldiers, marching as to war,
With the Cross of Jesus going on before."

Then, as day is dying, sounds the sunset hymn. The Watcher turns his thoughts westward, looks and listens as clouds of the sky grow golden and the water is aflame. The waves on the beach and the swelling sea bear another song to the ear of the waiting One. Wave beyond wave lift their voices till the inland sea is passed and the stormy ocean echoes the strain; until on its further shore the word becomes articulate. The new Land, the West Land, is sending its tribute of praise to the King Eternal.

"My faith looks up to Thee, Thou Lamb of Calvary, Saviour divine."

"THEN the devil leaveth Him, and angels came and ministered to Him." And it is ever so with us. First the evil to fight. There is none to help us. It is our battle. Single-handed and alone we must meet the enemy. But when we have conquered, angels come. The angel of the home weeps for gladness when her son comes back, victor not only over the Hun but also over the world, the flesh and the devil. Friend welcomes friend back from the field of conflict. All the good angels of God come to minister to the loyal soldier of Christ. But it is only when we come off more than conquerers. When we doubt, disobey, and fail, then the angel of God comes, but with a two-edged sword, not to minister but to drive us forth from our paradise, out into a world of thorns and strife.

What shall we do? Go with Satan out of Eden, or as Jesus did, refuse even a loaf in the wilderness, and with him live forever in the Paradise of God?

The Shepherd's Return

THEIR eyes to the east where the star blazed bright,
They come home from Bethlehem, David's town;
Their staffs in their hands, they steal home at night
To tell of the King who from heaven came down.

They watch for their flocks on the Judean hills;
They hear and hearken to sound of the harp;
When suddenly a new note through them thrills
And fills them with sorrow at those who carp.

With thoughts of Herod still fresh in their minds,
And scenes they had left forever made theirs,
They stop and stand where the old pathway winds;
They break forth in speeches which end in prayers.

Can this be the place from which we just came
To find in the manger the Saviour, the King?
Can these be the hills where we whispered his name,
Scarce daring believe this wondrous new thing?

Can this little hamlet we once called home,
That nestled so near the all-blessing sky;
Can this be the place whence we fared forth to roam
In quest of the Saviour whose star gleamed high?

Have these gentle shepherds slept in the sun
While the world marched on; while the King was near?
While a new earth touched with heaven was begun,
Did they feel neither awe nor faith nor fear?

O stars with the soul of light in your eyes,
Steep them with the message, the mystery, O spheres,
And bless with a vision the King can't despise
The ones who saw not, lest they see through tears.

TO THOUGHTFUL minds everywhere, and especially to those who have suffered bereavement, as multitudes have done of late, the problem of life beyond the grave is one that wellnigh overshadows all others. In the mass of religious literature that has been produced during the war, we know of no single volume that has dealt with this subject in the same spirit of reverent scholarship and painstaking thoroughness that mark the book "Reunion in Eternity," from the pen of Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll. The author modestly refers to his book as a humble contribution on a subject concerning which all literature is extremely meager. Yet he has written with a sympathy that will be like balm to thousands of troubled souls at this time. Dr. Nicoll's style of discussion differs from that of most writers on religious subjects. He counsels and leads and illuminates, and replaces apprehension with confidence which gradually becomes conviction.

He shows us that reunion in the life to come is the heritage of all who believe in Christ as Redeemer and Restorer. "He has risen and ascended; . . . this carries reunion with it. Our gathering together unto Him will of itself make necessary our knowledge of one another." He does not hold that this excludes the vast majority. We do not know what may pass of a sudden, at the very moment of dying, between the soul and Christ. If the case of the penitent thief on the cross had been an exceptional one, it would not have been written in the Word of God.

Reunion, Dr. Nicoll holds, rests upon the permanence of personality. Without memory man ceases to exist. Jesus yearned for His friends and could not bear to leave them. Because Christ is Christ, and His people His people, and because there is a great and deep love for many who have been parted for the time by death, he holds it certain that we shall know them in the world of Eternity far better than we ever knew them in the world of Time. We can only comprehend this wonder dimly now, but we shall know better hereafter.

In these days when the thoughts of men are turned to their dead as they never were before, the Easter message of a Risen Saviour brings with it a larger meaning and a greater fulness of assurance. There is a special timeliness in Dr. Nicoll's book. He reviews the testimonies of the great spiritual minds of our own day to show how faithfully they held the larger hope without which life would be objectless. Believers are children of the Resurrection. They look forward to the life beyond—a life of limitless growth and ceaseless progress toward perfection; a life of unbroken love, of loyal friendships and sweet companionships. Jesus clearly implied all of these as included in the heavenly life. And in the hearts of His true followers there is no belief more firmly held. His resurrection has given to us the supreme demonstration of the reality of life beyond the grave.

Dr. Nicoll brings not only the assurance of immortality conveyed in the Gospels, but presents the Old Testament teachings on the subject and also the strong belief in the classical world of the ancients in a future existence in which identity is preserved. We could wish that the book might be in the hands of all readers of the Christian Herald, to enlighten their minds, strengthen their faith and give the comfort and courage that come from a wider view and a better understanding.

The Church's Busiest Year

IN THE official record of the activities and standing of the various denominations in the United States, compiled for the Christian Herald by Dr. H. K. Carroll, and printed in this issue, there is much to encourage all who are interested in the progress of religion in our own land. In many ways, the past year of manifold activities has been the greatest in the history of the Church. In the home camps, at the battlefronts and on the ocean, pastors and chaplains and organized workers have done splendid service. From the time of our entrance in the war, they sent many hundreds of their best men to the front, leaving scores of churches pastorless and delegating their regular home work to other hands. Besides this, over 73,000 of the young men in the congregations went to the war to fight for freedom and democracy, and thousands among them made the supreme sacrifice. Under such conditions, and with influenza responsible for closing a very large proportion of the churches for weeks and even months, it is not surprising to learn, from the complete statistics, that the registered increase in membership has been the smallest in many years—less than 300,000. The very fact that there have been gains in this year of sorrow suffering, sickness and death proves the vitality of the Church, the growth of which even the world war could not stop.

In the many fields of effort which the war opened the Church has had the generous and unstinted support of God's people everywhere. Never has such a volume of offerings poured into its treasuries. In former years it was a wonderful thing to raise tens of thousands of dollars for the Lord's work; now the enthusiasm of the people has shown itself in giving millions in a steady stream. All the Church's activities, home and foreign, as well as her great spiritual campaign among our heroic troops, have been abundantly supplied. And this is the experience in practically all the denominations, big and little. Christian America has demonstrated that its generosity has no limits where vital duties call for cooperative action. Surely, wealth has never been put to such noble purposes.

Entering the war with intense zeal, the Church has come out of it stronger, nobler, purified, and with a new consecration. It gave all it had, its best energies, abilities, strength and reserve forces, spending itself in a way undreamed of in other years. It emerges with a clearer sense of its high mission.

An Anti-Prohibition Trick

THE billion dollar anti-Prohibition propaganda fund of the liquor interests is actively at work, and one of its first subtle indications is seen in an agitation against tobacco and the use of alcohol in flavoring extracts and in the arts and sciences. The cunning of the serpent is seen in the causing of this agitation to appear to come from ultra-Prohibition sources. Some extreme statements of certain temperance workers and organizations are quoted to make it seem that Prohibition is to be frantically carried to such a degree of intolerance as to ruin many lines of legitimate business. Much capital is being made of the fact that Georgia and Texas already have laws which, if strictly interpreted, will mean the exclusion of any article, medicinal or otherwise, containing more than one-half of one per cent. alcohol.

The designed effect of such agitation is, of course, to divide prohibitionists against themselves on questions of doubtful importance, just at this critical time when a tremendous effort is being made by the combined liquor interests to defeat the enforcement of prohibition itself.

Never was there a time when, more than now, all prohibitionists, conservatives and extremists alike, needed to stand united for the strict enforcement of straight prohibition.

All the devices and powers of evil are arrayed against the consummation of the triumph over the saloon.

Until that triumph has been fully completed, true temperance workers must stand together for that glorious attainment.

"Wet" and "Dry" Camps

CANADA now regrets that she did not assume a firmer attitude on the liquor question, particularly as it is related to life and morals in the military camps. We learn from the Montreal Witness that the military authorities there are now disposed to believe the evil might have been "largely prevented by such reasonable action as the United States took from the first." Early in the war, the Witness agitated for "dry camps" for Canadian soldiers in Great Britain, but its protests were ignored. As an example of the outcome of official carelessness, it cites the recent disturbances at Kinmel Camp in Wales, where some 18,000 Canadian soldiers were stationed. Surrounding the camp were a number of camp stores kept by civilians, who overcharged the soldiers in selling them certain supplies. Discontent arose, and one day a crowd of four hundred soldiers started to raid the camp stores. In its progress the raid gathered hundreds of men who had nothing to do with the original grievance. Stores were tumbled inside out and cigarettes and other stuff scattered around. Quantities of liquor, which had been forbidden by the government during the war, but which military inefficiency had overlooked, fell into the hands of the raiders—and then came real trouble. Canadian soldiers are ordinarily temperate, but liquor transforms any man, and there was a sudden change from "mischief and horseplay into madness and anarchy." There was firing on both sides, and five men were killed, two of whom had no right to be in the quarrel at all. It will strike the average American as being an extremely fortunate thing that our own government took measures in time to save our camps from the degradation that would have followed any tolerance of the liquor evil within military precincts. T British are considering the advantage of dry camp

The March of Bolshevism

WHETHER the sudden outbreak of Bolshevis in Hungary, and the threat of its spreadi throughout middle and western Europe, a real development of its power, or, as some correspo dents have suggested, merely a scene cleverly stage by the Teutonic allies to force better terms throug terrorizing the Peace Conference, is an open questio Lenine may be covertly the ally of Germany, or may not. He may have joined hands in such a compact, or he may simply have taken advantage of th open door which the peace complications and the industrial and economic disturbances provided as new outlet for Soviet activities, offering as easy conquest, not only Hungary but other states. Hungary's slide into Bolshevism, whether planned for i effect upon the Allies, or taken because inevitable, a thing accomplished—a fact to be dealt with.

Will the Allies rise equal to the emergency and mee it by firm action under capable leadership? Thei forces are not war-weary, and they are only partiall demobilized. Whatever the Peace Conference may do the armies of freedom and justice should be prepare for any emergency that may arise. The fruits o victory so dearly won should not be sacrificed through unpreparedness, or by failing to interpret a seriou danger. The world's peace demands haste. Too much time has already been wasted; there has been too much disputing over rival claims for territory Now, the one vital task of making peace must be speeded up; matters of less importance can wait With Bolshevism knocking at the frontiers of western Europe, all petty jealousies must be swept aside Peace among the nations, food for the peoples who are in the stress of famine, and the reestablishment of industrial activities—these are among the immediate necessities that will help the situation.

It is a good time for statesmen in our own land to keep their ears close to the ground. The possibility of general social revolution was foreseen by thoughtful observers long before the war ended. There is much might be done by ourselves toward improving our own social and economic conditions, and it should be done without further waste of time.

Our Victors and Our Duty

IN 1865, and again in 1898, New York had welcomed home victorious troops. But March 25, 1919, welcomed the victors of the hardest battles ever fought by men against machines. Called into action at Kemmel Hill, the 27th Division had shown its mettle. In the late days of September, with the Germans at bay before their "impregnable" Hindenburg line, the 27th was called again and was sent forward to break through. In three days fighting, worse than a living hell, they went on and on and through, and the German western line crumbled as their Argonne line was failing before the lads in khaki from overseas.

It wasn't the Allied guns, it wasn't the tanks, it wasn't the gas or the shells or the fog, although these helped; it was the unquenchable spirit of American youth, fired with the vision of liberty and the will to sacrifice which burst like an avalanche upon the Hun, shattered his morale and swept over his defense.

The victory was a spiritual victory. The victors, as they marched up Fifth Avenue, were the living expressions of the purpose of America. And how they marched! Heads high, lines straight, bright bayoneted guns at the firm angle that speaks the ready soldier, every boyish face earnest, yet with a lingering smile about the mouth and eyes, New York's own, the 27th, they swept up Fifth Avenue to the heartening chorus of a city's and a state's applause and to the wild cheering of happy multitudes.

But the victory will be only half won if American democracy should fail to greet every soldier, not alone with applause and cheer and chocolate bars, but with a wider opportunity than any yet open to her sons. These men have suffered, but they have learned leadership, they have returned stronger, better, more capable than when they went away. They are America's greatest asset, and to them she owes her most immediate obligation. Let it not be said that any man who wore the khaki was mustered out of service into the army of the unemployed. As these boys saved democracy, so Americans in their spirit of sacrifice, of unselfish service, must save the world. The League of Nations will cost something. But America may not count the cost of world liberty in the coin of national advantage. We must lead the world away from caviling and carnage to purity of purpose and to peace.

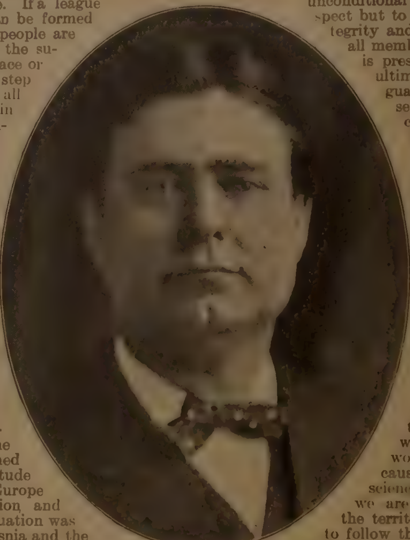
“NO DEMOCRACY IN LEAGUE

By HON. WILLIAM E. BORAH, United States Senator from Idaho

Senator Borah



THE safest guarantee of peace is the popular voice. If a league or an alliance can be formed under which the people are given control of the supreme issue of peace or war it will be a substantial step toward lasting peace. But all plans which leave this issue in the hands of a few men unchecked and unrestrained by the popular command are but the reproduction of the old system under which Europe has been tortured and decimated for three centuries. Give the machinery by which you are to prevent war over to the ultimate dominance of the people if you hope for results in the cause of peace.

This fearful war which has just closed was hatched in the chancelleries of Europe. For three decades a few men entrusted with unrestrained power in foreign affairs falsified and deceived as in the Morocco affair, and schemed and conspired as in a multitude of incidents, until official Europe was saturated with suspicion and jealousy and hate. The situation was fallow for the incident in Bosnia and the sinister move of an unconscionable and ambitious ruler bent upon world dominion. The people upon whom the fearful sacrifice was to fall were powerless either in Germany or elsewhere to check or stay the onrushing trend of events. Their interests were not considered and their wishes were wholly disregarded. A few men sitting behind closed doors, entrusted with the power of life and death over their fellows, some through ignorance, some from design, drove straight for this cataclysm of suffering and death. Secrecy and heredity, deceit and ambition played their wild game, and the masses waited uninformed and powerless for the hour of slaughter.

There has not been a war in Europe in two centuries which has not been brought on largely in the same way.

NOW it is proposed in the interests of peace to remove still farther from the people the power to say whether or not there shall be peace or war. The public voice is silenced entirely. There is at the present time in some countries at least, like our own, a partial check on the part of the people. But the power to engender, foment and order or bring about a condition of war is now to be placed in the hands of five men, nine at the most, over whom the people have and will have absolutely no control, no check. Not only are these men to have the actual authority under the League to bring on war, but by latitudinous and unrestrained discretion they are to be placed in a position where they can foment or through ignorance or design engender a war at any time, and the masses of the people are helpless except to openly rebel and to utterly disregard the obligation of the League. If the League is to be lived up to, if the contract into which it is proposed that we enter be observed, then these men will have under their absolute control the issue of peace or war.

This proposed constitution creates first an Executive Council composed in the beginning of the representatives from five great nations and the representatives of four other nations to be added. If a majority is to control, then three in the first instance and five in the last would control the Council. In any event nine men would control the Council. This Council is authorized to deal with any matter within the sphere of action of the League "or affecting the peace of the world." And Article XI provides that war or "threat of war," whether immediately affecting any of the high contracting parties or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the latter, and the high contracting parties reserve the right to take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. So we have for its jurisdiction everything affecting the peace of the world and everything which threatens war, whether these things come from members of the League or from other nations. The issue of peace or war of the whole world is therefore within the easy reach of the jurisdiction of the League.

NOW as an illustration, let us take Article X. The high contracting parties undertake to respect and preserve against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the League. This is a solemn, unconditional guarantee not only to respect but to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of all members of the League. And it is presumed that all nations will ultimately join the League. This guarantee, this pledge to preserve, carries with it our financial, our economic and our military power if any or all of these are necessary. Who is to advise and direct the method and manner of fulfilment? The Executive Council. If the territorial integrity of any nation is involved or the political independence of any state is threatened, or if there is a threat of war anywhere, this League has the authority to advise as to the means by which the obligation we have incurred is to be fulfilled. Whether the territorial integrity is based upon justice, upon righteousness, whether the cause which would disturb it is a just cause, or whether there is conscience and decency behind it, we are nevertheless to preserve the territorial integrity, and we are to follow the advice of the Executive Council as to how it shall be done. Although the Executive Council's advice might be regarded as vicious and unwise, as characterized by ignorance and selfishness, by the many reasons which often lead those diplomatic combinations to foment war, the people would have no voice whatever nor any power to review their action. If the Executive Council should advise that the United States should send one million men to protect the territorial integrity of China, or Great Britain in India, or of Russia in the Siberias, we would be under contractual and moral obligation to act, although we might regard the whole scheme as unjust and unconscionable.

THE point which I make is this: that there is ample power for this Executive Council to foment war as well as to promote peace. Evil-minded men, selfish, corrupt men, ambitious and militaristic men, could bring on a war much more easily than the men who fomented and instigated this war if they should see fit to do so. There is not a word in the constitution which restrains or limits them. Their law is their discretion or their will. There is no way to check or control them on the part of the people. They are there, so far as the constitution provides, for life, with a jurisdiction equal to that which the Kaiser coveted and as free from restraint as it would be possible for nine men to be.

When the Fathers organized this government they thought it necessary to put a check upon their Representatives, upon their Senators, upon their President, not only in the way of counter-checks but in the way of limited terms of service. But we are here presenting to these few men, whom the people can neither elect, check nor control, a power which if in the hands of evil-disposed men could bring on a world war at any time.

Suppose this Council were in session over the question of preserving the territorial integrity of some European power. The United States would have one vote. Europe would have from three to five votes at least. Asia would have the balance in all probability. The policy could and likely would be determined by aliens, and our people would be without any recourse whatever.

Let us take another illustration as to the want of democracy in this constitution. The territorial status of nations of today may under the law of change and progress be wholly different tomorrow. A subject nation may want its freedom and the United States might sympathize with it. But there is no provision nor any possible clause under this constitution by which the principle of self-determination could be applied. If by reason of the internal disturbance within a nation "threat of war" should arise, or if that which the Executive Council might choose to regard as a threat of war should arise, they could call into action the economic or military forces of all members of the League to put down the disturbance. There is ample power and ample authority under this constitution for any Executive Council to crush out any movement for freedom or independence on the part of any subject nation or any small nation. Certainly a constitution for a League of Nations ought to have somewhere a recognition of the rights of the people and a chance for them to be heard upon the question of peace or war, and also a recognition of right for every people in a peaceful way to cho their own form of government and their own meth and manner of living.

THIS is not in fact a league of peoples, or eve league of nations. It is a league of diplomats league of imperialists, of a few great powers as agai all the rest of the world. It is a league of the sa breed of men and the same official caste which h brought sorrow and suffering to Europe for these ce turies. It is an autocracy, irresponsible, uncheck and uncontrolled by any action or authority of t people. And it is an autocracy based in the last ana sis on force.

I speak in the utmost sincerity and wholly f from personal reference, and I declare that it is t most perfect scheme to eliminate the voice or the fluence of the people from the question of peace war that has yet been proposed.

The power of the Czar over his subjects, the will the Kaiser in his own fatherland, these were bad a wrought fearful results, but there was a limitation their jurisdiction. But here are five men who territory is the world, with its economic forces and last its military forces, its material wealth and its m power subject to their orders and liable to be direct toward any movement which they either deem nece sary to preserve the territorial integrity or politic independence of any nation, or which they shall de necessary to sterilize a threat of war.

They are not only to decide what constitutes threat, what constitutes territorial invasion, wh constitutes political independence, but they are decide upon the manner of dealing with it, and they have the same right to deal with it from war standpoint as they have from a peace stan point.

If they want peace they can ameliorate or co promise and placate; if they want war, or even if th do not want war but act unwisely, they foment wa

Autocracy in its fullest and sublimest dreams cou covet no more.

Present Plan Unfair

By Hon. Thomas Sterling

United States Senator from South Dakota

I DO not wish to go on record as opposed to an League of Nations whatever, and join heartily the desire expressed in the so-called Lodge resolutio signed by thirty-nine Senators, "that the nations the world should unite to promote peace and gener disarmament." But I am opposed to the constitutio of a League of Nations framed at Paris, and which now before the world, for the following reasons:

First. It involves a surrender of some of our national sovereignty and independence to the decre of the diplomats who may constitute the body o delegates or the Executive Council of the League, an that, too, in matters pertaining to our vital interest

Second. It gives to any nation, however small like Serbia, Rumania or Cuba, a voting power in th body of delegates as great as the voting power of th United States with its vast population and resource Third. The constitution provides for admissio to membership of self-governing colonies and dominions. I think you can readily see what power thi would give Great Britain, with Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa ready to support he when her interests are at stake. Great Britain woul thus have practically five votes in the body of delegates to our one. When I think of this situation I a not surprised that General Smuts and Lloyd Georg should be in favor of the proposed constitution.

Fourth. We have the Monroe Doctrine as one of the fundamentals in our American policy. It is founded on the principle of self-preservation; we know something of its origin, and know also that in comparatively recent years we have had occasion to invoke the Monroe Doctrine against the aggressions of European nations in South America. Under this proposed constitution for a League of Nations, we leave any controversy involving the Monroe Doctrine to be determined by an Executive Council or by a body of delegates, the majority of whom, it is fair to presume, have never had any and never will have any sympathy with our Monroe Doctrine.

Further, the question of immigration is one of domestic policy. It has always been so regarded. The idea of self-preservation is involved in the right of any nation to determine what alien elements shall be admitted to its shores or be permitted to settle within its boundaries.

Under the terms of the proposed constitution the Executive Council may in effect declare war for or on behalf of the United States. Are we willing that the Constitution of the United States should in this respect be ignored and the power with which Congress is clothed to declare war and raise armies and navies be made subservient to the Executive Council of any League of Nations?

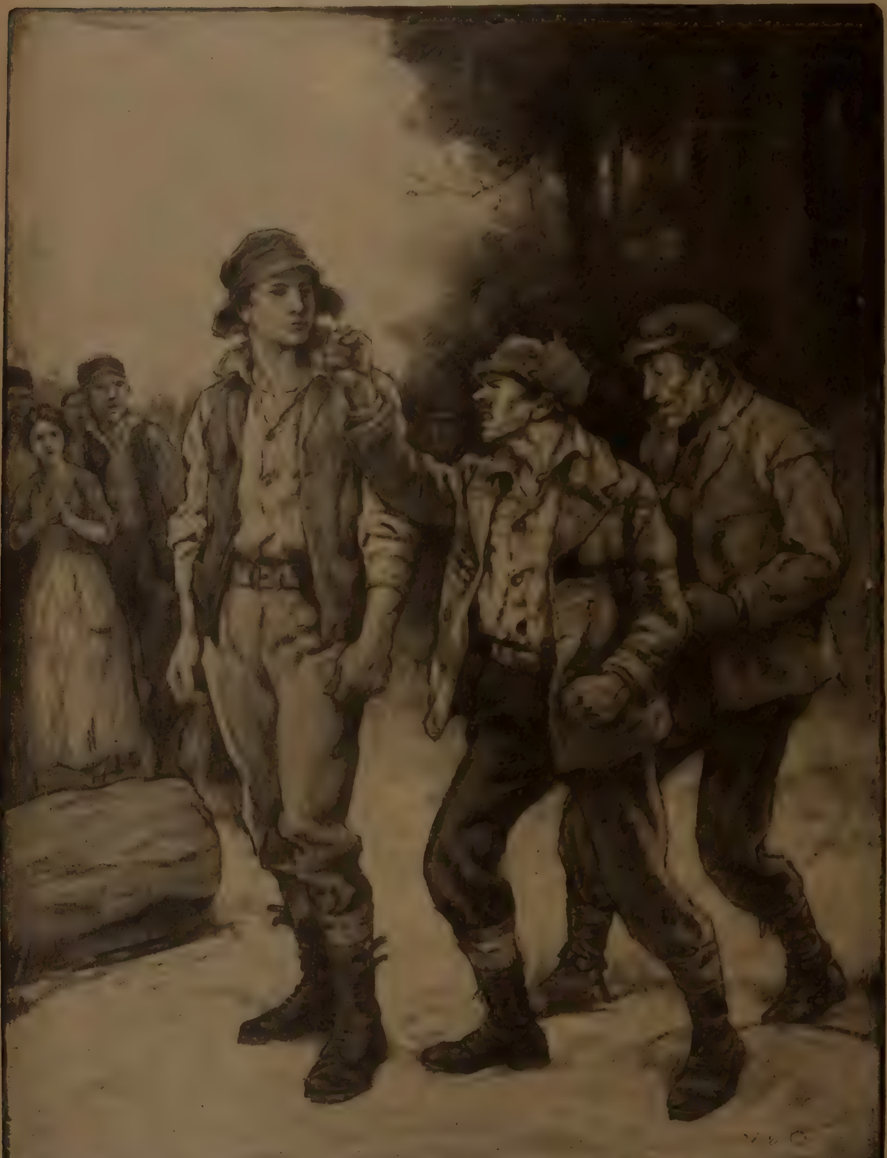
SLEEPING DOGS

An Alaskan Story of Moral Courage

By JOSEPH HENRY BENNER

Illustrated by Varian and Osborne



Mouse took a step nearer. He shot a fist under Jerry's nose. "Now," he cried, "are you goin' to make good my dog that you shot? If you won't pay me in cash I'll take his worth out o' your hide—see?"

GOLIATH and Bullock dropped their end of the log heavily. Jerry tossed his end, and the great log lay where it fell, with one end upon the ground, the other end high on the pile of lesser logs. Again there was a cheer. Goliath and Bullock, who together had more trouble with their end than Jerry singly had with his, took turns in violently shaking Jerry's hand.

"You are the king bee all right, all right; the king bee for strength in Alaska," boomed Bullock.

"You can put your ten fingers and your ten toes in my coffee, and that's no idle boast," declared Goliath.

Mule, Slug'em, Butch, took turns in shaking Jerry by the hand. "Better'n any two of us," was the consensus of their opinion.

"I say it's worth while havin' had this trouble on account of the Yukon raisin' up in a spring freshet and throwin' logs round folks's yards, to find out there's a man in the world as strong as you," declared Derrick.

Lucy Lambertson met a glance which Jerry swept her, with eyes glowing with pride in him.

"Hide not thy light under a bushel," crowed Pinkie. "We've knowed you six months and never suspected you to be as strong as Jonah and Mathusaleh."

Jerry plainly was delighted with all this. But all at once the laughing look upon his face faded. He grew pale. An expression of dismay, fear, crept over his features.

Following the direction in which Jerry's eyes were fixed, every one turned to see what it was that made the blood leave Jerry's face, that caused him to quake in spirit.

On the outskirts of the assemblage were standing two new arrivals. They were strangers in the town.

A moment the townspeople stood at gaze upon these men. The two men on their part spent the time in taking stock of their appraisers.

Suddenly one of the townsmen gave yell, sprang from his place and rush at the two new-comers. He seized eac by a hand and pumped those hands u and down.

"Welcome to our city," he cried "Why, you two old sinners, you tw old sons o' guns o' cronies o' mine, I sure am glad to set my peepers on you once more. Haven't seen you for fou long years. It's a smokin' wonder I haven't gone blind for lack of a sight o you."

During this outburst there came fro the men so addressed a stream of ejaculations running after this fashion: "Ol Friskie! Howdy, howdy, Friskie? Gla to grab your paw again, all right, al right! Four years, yep! Good ol sport. Yep, yep!" And along wit these ejaculations there came outburst of crackling merriment and coarse guffaws of glee.

Friskie turned to the onlooking assemblage. "Fellow citizens," he cried waving a hand at one of the new-comer "This is my old friend Mouse. An this," he continued, waving his hand a the other individual, "is another ol friend o' mine. His name's Nutty."

The man who was called Mouse wa not quick in his motions, he was not o any grayness in color, nor was he sharp featured. Yet all in all, in an indefinable way, he resembled the rodent afte which he was named. It must hav been from the way his mustache stuc straight out from his lip, by the forwar thrust of his head from the shoulders, b the fact that his constant chewing wa done after the manner of a mouse nibbling upon something.

The companion to Mouse hovered i his wake like an auxiliary. This traile Nutty, was a creature who indisputabl had the appearance of being what hi name implied. He had a vacant fac with a hanging jaw that left his mout agape. His eyes constantly change back and forth, in expression, now having in them a far-away look, now a intense, closely observing gaze.

Mouse and Nutty flashed thei glances about over the assemblage They nodded their heads in every direction. All persons present had been included in their head-bobbings when th two new-comers finally became still an fixed their gaze upon one common point They looked steadily at Jerry. And Jerr visibly shrank from under their eyes.

The two men took in all the points o Jerry's behavior under their scrutiny At length Mouse gave a grunt; Nutty snickered. Both men stepped forward They came to a halt in front of Jerry close up to him. Jerry quailed. A lea came over Mouse's face. Nutty stood at his chief's elbow, his eyes now seeing nothing, now piercing the heart of him they looked upon; his mouth hung open loosely. He was a masterpiece of vacuity.

"What will these men do?" was a question that repeated itself in Jerry's mind, with each repetition shaping for itself an answer more terrible than the answer gone before. "They know my weakness—they—oh, they will do something, I am sure, that will show me up in a poor light." His knees shook under him; a tightness came upon his chest. "They will cook up some lie, and with that for excuse they will go for me. They'll——"

Mouse took a step nearer. He shot a fist under Jerry's nose. "Now," he cried, "are you goin' to make good my dog that you shot? If you won't pay me in cash; I'll take his worth out o' your hide—see?"

"I never shot a dog of yourn," weakly protested Jerry.

"You call me a liar?" exclaimed Mouse. And he smote Jerry in the face, making the blood come.

From the crowd there rose murmurs of resentment at the conduct of Mouse. But more general were the muttered expressions of perplexity at Jerry's attitude. From Lucy there came a low cry, the meaning of which it would have been difficult to analyze.

Jerry looked neither to the right nor left. He stood stolidly. He took a handkerchief from his pocket and touched it to the wound.

"That's for callin' me a liar, see?" declared Mouse. "Now what's comin' next is to be for satisfaction for the loss

REO

All You Can Ask in a Motor Car

A Popular Reo Model — 3-Passenger Roadster

A definite percentage of the Reo output each season is of this popular type.

A most versatile and useful Motor Car.

So simple in control, driving becomes almost automatic.

Dependable as only a Reo-made car can be. In operation and upkeep, most economical.

Professional and business men — physicians, lawyers, architects, contractors, collectors, salesmen—men engaged in every phase of modern professional and industrial activity, and whose time is valuable —find this Reo Roadster ideally suited to their needs.

So the demand for this model also, is greatly in excess of the possible factory output this year as in all previous years.

Tardy buyers are certain to be disappointed—order now or you may have to accept your second choice in lieu of a Reo.

In external appearance—beauty of design and grace of contour — this 5-passenger Reo touring car fills the eye of the connoisseur.

In details of finish and appointments—quality of materials and painstaking workmanship — in accord with the best traditions of this house.

In mechanical excellence — representative of the soundest engineering principles and the ripest experience.

Reo quality — Reo reliability — Reo value — is the direct result of that combination.

Sturdiness combined with beauty — luxuriousness allied with Low Upkeep.

Is it any wonder we never have—from the very inception of this concern—been able to make enough automobiles to supply all who wanted Reos?

This season is no exception save that, if anything, the proportion of demand to supply is greater than ever.

So the only way to be at all sure of obtaining a Reo for spring delivery, is to see your Reo distributor and place your order at once.

Today—won't be a minute too soon.

An Alaskan Story of Moral Courage

o' my fine dog." With that he advanced to the assault.

"No, no!" pleaded Jerry, retreating. "Don't strike me again!"

Mouse guffawed triumphant and mocking. Nutty cackled unrestrainedly.

"Don't make me real mad," continued Jerry. "I don't want to fight yo'. Don't make me fight, don't." The last of these words rolled from his throat in a rattle that made them almost incoherent.

"I'll beat yo' to a pulp, that's what I'll do" shouted Mouse. "Not make yo' fight me, ho, ho! That's what I want yo' to do." The jeer of the man rose to a scream of delight. He made a rush.

Jerry sidestepped and holding out his hands to ward off blows, he cried: "I'll pay yo' for your dog; I'll pay yo'; what do you want?"

Mouse ceased his attack. With a broad flourish of his arm he wiped his mouth upon his sleeve. He stated his price. In less time than it takes to tell Jerry had paid the sum that Mouse demanded. Nutty leaped into the air and struck his heels together thrice before he came back to earth again. He smote thrashingly about him with his fists a half dozen times or so.

The townspeople separated into groups. Many bent upon their fellow citizen looks that were puzzled yet withal full of pity and sympathy. Others cast at the man glances that were expressive only of the darkest scorn.

At the foot of the front door-steps stood Lucy. She was grieved, amazed. Was there also in her face a look of disgust? Uncertain, ashamed, yet with a prideful look which seemed pathetically out of place, Jerry drew up to the girl.

"You don't believe that I was afraid of the fellow, do you?" he faltered.

The girl looked him up and down.

"What else shall I think," the girl poured forth. "What else is there for me to believe?"

"Yes, yes, I know," muttered Jerry. He was restraining himself from letting out words that were seething to be released.

"Oh," said Lucy, starting some speech but breaking off with a catch in her voice that was like a sob.

"It can be explained," stated Jerry. "I can explain it all."

"Then explain," urged Lucy.

"I—yes—yes," he weakly stammered. "Some day I will." He rubbed his forehead with his hand. He felt his throat. He moved his head as though his collar was too tight.

Fiercely the girl stamped her foot, and with a violent exclamation she turned and rushed into the house.

Jerry hung his head and, dragging his feet heavily, he started to walk away. He set out in the direction which would take him out into the lonely places. Everybody watched him as he went. No one uttered a word.

Two men coming from the main part of the camp rapidly approached the crowd. They came up to the silent gathering. Their entrance upon the scene set loose the tongues that had been held still so long.

"Well, I'll—" was an expression that seemed to have been seized upon by the majority as one best suited to express their feelings over what they had seen.

"A yellow streak in him," sneered one voice.

"A coward," scorned another.

In agreement with these expressions there came numerous jeers and mockings.

"Hold on now," broke out Pinkie. "None o' that, I say. No names slung at Jerry. There's somethin' behind all this that we don't know nothin' about."

"It hurts, don't it, Pinkie?" remarked Friskie in a taunting voice, following a burst of derisive laughter which met Pinkie's defense. "Yo' knew he was strong; you blew that horn and made him parade his strength. But yo' didn't know he was a 'fraid baby."

"'Fraid baby yourself!" retorted Pinkie. "I say that to you if you say that o' Jerry."

The situation showed fair to develop into a broil. The possibility of such a development was turned aside by the attitude which all at once was so decidedly taken by the strong men of the crowd.

"He ain't no coward," declared Goliath. "No more'n I ain't no coward. And I'll slap the fellow's jaw that says I'm one."

"'Tis like Pinkie says," asserted Bullock. "There's somethin' behind this we don't know nothin' about."

Slug'em and Butch snorted in speechless disgust at the idea of Jerry having been afraid.

"He's not got a hair on's head that's afraid o' any man or gang o' men," Mule averred.

"Anyway," cried Derrick, pointing a savagely contemptuous finger at Mouse, and his voice rising shriller and more shrill with every word, "what for should a powerful lad like him be afeared o' a shrimp like the guy that bullied him? 'Tain't in nacher, is my verdict."

"Gospel," asked Pinkie of one of the men who lately had come up, "would you pick out Jerry for a coward?"

"Jerry is a man of great moral courage," returned Gospel, "and I believe he's a man of physical courage as well. But," continued Gospel, and here he indicated his companion, "this man wants very much to have a talk with Jerry. I wonder would Jerry come back." With that Gospel called out: "Jerry! Ho, Jerry!"

Jerry turned. Gospel beckoned. Jerry retraced his steps, moving automatically, as though he were being worked by a string which had been pulled by the beckoning hand of Gospel.

Gospel went up to Jerry. He looked him in the eyes with an expression that said as plainly as words could have conveyed his meaning: "There's a misunderstanding here concerning you, Jerry, but as for me, I'm with you heart and soul."

Gospel turned to the man he had brought with him. "Reverend Mr. Hutton, this is Jerry." Introducing the newcomer he said: "Jerry, this is Reverend Mr. Hutton, of whom you have heard a great deal. Mr. Hutton wants to ask a favor of you."

Taking in the assemblage by a wave of his hand Gospel said: "Friends, let me make you acquainted with Reverend Mr. Hutton. Brother," he continued, addressing the clergyman, "these are of the sheep in these parts who are straying outside the pasture of the Lord. May they ere long permit themselves to be herded into the flock of the fold."

"Jerry," explained Mr. Hutton, "I came in on the last stage. The hotel accommodations are taxed to their utmost. I find myself obliged to look for some other place to put up at. Would you be so kind as to take me in for the time of my stay here?"

"I'm honored that you should pick me out as the one you should ask for accommodations," returned Jerry.

Jerry and the clergyman had arrived at Jerry's cabin. They were inside, secure from prying eyes. Mr. Hutton brought forth a well-stuffed bag.

"There's the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars in gold dust," he said. "It is to be used to build a hospital in this town. I want to leave this bag with you for two or three days. It will be safer with you than on my person. Will you assume the responsibility of taking care of this until I return from the little mining camp I must go to, about a dozen miles back in the hills?"

Jerry looked long into the minister's eyes. At length, "Yes," he replied.

"We know you down at the bishop's house as a true member of the church," Mr. Hutton remarked, by way of expressing his complete confidence that the trust would not be broken.

"I try to be all a man should be," declared Jerry. His eyes looked inward; a profound depth was in those orbs.

Shortly before midnight Mr. Hutton took his departure. After he had been swallowed up by the heavy gloom of a night that only occasionally showed the merest strip of star-spotted sky, and but the fleetest glimpses of a fugitive moon, Jerry reached under his mattress where he had placed the bag with the precious contents and pushed it farther over toward the wall against which his bunk was built. He fidgeted about the room. He strode to and fro, back and forth. At last, without undressing, he laid down for the night. He fell into a fitful slumber. His sleep was constantly being broken with dreams of robbery, of murder.

Suddenly he was awakened more thoroughly than at any previous time. The occasion was a noise that struck him as carrying a sharper note of reality than anything by which he had yet been disturbed. The sense that it was a real sound remained with him after he was fully awake; and that sense grew.

His dreams of holes being sawed into the roof; of the sides of the cabin being blown in; of the floor being heaved up to give ingress to robbers, were now replaced by a startling actuality. His door was sprung open with the shock of heavy bodies hurling themselves against it. The next instant his doorway was momentarily blocked in by the rush of two men making a tumultuous entrance.

Jerry flung himself off the bed and lunged forward to the attack upon the intruders. It was a blind lunge in the dark. He received a blow on the head; in the winking of an eyelash he felt the impact of a second savage blow. It struck him on the neck. After that it was as if a wind blew about him in fierce gusts.

The voices of his assailants were the soughing of the storm. It was painful that this soughing should be intelligible, conveying information which it troubled him to receive, yet in which he had the keenest interest.

"That's one of 'em," he heard a voice remark in a deep guttural. "Where's the other?"

"Look sharp," came another voice. "Make no wrong moves."

"Hit the bed a crack," was an order spoken savagely by the first speaker. And these words were followed by sounds of blows upon the bed.

"Let's shoot under the bed and into the corners," said the man who had done the striking.

"No, don't yo' dare shoot," was the growling response.

"We've got to get him."

"No shootin'. Not yet."

There was a pause. Then, "I'll strike a light," said the authoritative one. "Yo' stand off a bit and watch the shanty close."

"All right." By the sounds that were made one could judge that the one who was going to do the watching had stepped upon the bunk.

The other closed the door. "Now, Nutty," he said, "I'm for shootin' if any one else shoots when the light goes on."

"So it's them," thought Jerry in his semi-consciousness. "Mouse and Nutty."

"Here comes the light," warned Mouse, and at once there was the small illumination of a match. The light pulled at Jerry's eyelids, but neither this pulling nor his own will could avail to open them. There buzzed about in his numbed mind the consideration that it was safest for him that his eyes should remain locked, and with that idea struggling in the back of his brain, he became reconciled to his inability to pry open the lids.

"There's no one else here," were the words with which the silence was at length broken by Mouse. He struck another match.

"No?" queried the other. "No one under the bed?"

"Didn't yo' see me lookin' under the bed, yo' fool? I'm tellin' yo' there's not a soul in the shack 'ceptin' us two and the bloke on the floor."

"Didn't get out'n the door afore yo' shet it, did he?" wondered Nutty, getting off the bed. "Why don't yo' light the lamp?"

Mouse turned and with the last s of the match he set the wick afl His fingers were scorched and he sw roundly. Then, "How's the guy?" inquired as he saw Nutty making examination of Jerry's injuries.

"Oh so," was the reply.

Mouse joined his companion in a vey. "Guess he's done for all righ was his comment.

"Huh, huh," grunted Nutty. T his mind flew back to the motive wh led to this crime, and he said with act pathos, "And after all, we don't get money now that the preacher is flow

"I think we do," declared Mouse. believe the stuff's here somewhere."

"I don't," weakly bewailed Nutty

"Shut up, anyway, till we have a lo about. I believe the parson left it he He's gone somewhere a bit, but will back here."

Jerry then heard added to the soug ing of the voices the newer soughing the noise of the search. He heard a r ping of the bedclothes; he heard cho lings of exultation when the bag w found. These sounds made him lo consciousness altogether for a whi When he came to once more Mouse w saying, "Yep, he's a goner all righ no gettin' away from that." And th Nutty's voice came to his ears. "We' murdered him, then, have we? There too many o' them things gettin' mark agin' me."

"What?"

"Murders."

"Rats in your garret."

"Too many killin's are gettin' chalk agin' you too, Mouse, declared Nutt "'Twon't be good for us."

"If you'd ha' done what I wanted t do, this thing wouldn't have been so."

"What was it yo' wanted me to th I wouldn't do, eh?"

"Hold up the stage, yo' bonehead, an take the stuff from the minister. B no, nothin' but sneak work for yourn."

"Bonehead, eh, so that's what y think o' me?"

"Sure, and you're not thinkin' you self the equal o' me, are you?"

"You're pretty smart, I 'low."

"Warn't it my brains that set m listenin' outside the bishop's windo when I got wind about this here hospi tal? Warn't it my ears that heard o this money bein' sent this away, now warn't it?"

"Yep," agreed Nutty, vastly admir ingly.

"But now that the guy's done, say, chuck the whimperin'," exclaimed Mouse. Then, "Anyway, come on," h ordered harshly.

The next instant the light no longe pulled at Jerry's eyelids. The door was opened. A breeze brushed over him, feeling good in its soft caressing movement about him, particularly as it stroked his head and fondled his brow. The door shut. He was in a dead silence. Thoughts began to weigh upon him like ponderous weights.

All at once he caught himself wondering how long the helplessness would last. This thought brought with it another, which was in the nature of a feeling of certainty that this thing which was holding him helpless was paralysis caused by the blows he had received. As he wondered and pondered he became conscious of a feeling of relief running over him. This made him happy. Then he had the realization that the first sign of recovery was evident when he was able to wonder about his ailment. The sense of this realization made him feel still better.

Suddenly there whizzed through his brain like a lightning flash the determination to find those men and settle with them. He reviewed his reasons for wishing to settle with them, logically. He thrilled with joy at the experience of the returning power to put things together in a reasoning process. With impatience to recover all his faculties and to regain his full physical strength he clenched his hands fiercely. Jubilant at having been able to do this with his hands he threw them open once more and then clenched them again and again.

Some Government War Secrets

—and the reason for the Victory Liberty Loan

WE HAD promised the Allied war-chiefs that we would have in France by July, 1918, 600,000 men. On that date we had a little over 1,900,000. We had behind them nearly 2,000,000 in this country under training who would have been on the front before July, 1919, and we had behind those 4,000,000 men as many more men as were necessary to do the job.

"Four million men in France meant at least 20,000,000 tons dead weight of shipping to take care of them, and we had that program under way and were making our maximum output just about the time the armistice was signed. Twenty million tons of shipping at present cost means just about $4,000,000,000 or a little over.

"Did you know that those 2,000,000 men in France, who did so much to bring the war to an end, had only one small battery of American-made artillery behind them; just one battery of 4.7 and a few big naval rifles! The rest of the artillery used by the American soldiers was made by Frenchmen in France. But, on the way was a great stream of shells that would have blown the German army off the earth. But that stuff had just come into large production in November, 1918. And it is for the deliveries on that big peak production that we have to pay in December and January and will have to continue to pay for in February."

"I was talking to a man the other day in the Engineering Department in Washington who told me that the output of mustard gas of the American factories by the beginning of this year would be ten tons for every ton that could be produced in the whole of Germany. I also learned from a source that I am not sure is authentic, but I will tell you the story for what it is worth, that a few American-made gas shells reached our front, but our army was asked not to use any of those shells on French soil because the gas in them was of such a terrible nature that not only would it have killed the Germans, but it would have eaten up the trees and vegetation and destroyed the fertility of the ground for years and years to come. We were saving that gas until we arrived on the German border."

"Our program for tanks, of which few got into action, was, I was told, to provide for a tank in 1919 for every 75 feet of the front."

"Those are some of the things that cost money, and practically none of those great supplies of artillery shells or gas shells or tanks, even of ships, practically none of that stuff was ever used. What an awful waste! What an awful waste of money! We are asked to pay for a dead horse that never drew a load! It is discouraging, paying for something that is no good!

"Well, let's see if it's any good. Do you realize that the German army was never really routed; that except for a little bit of a stretch down in Alsace-Lorraine it was never fighting on German soil. They were brave soldiers, the German soldiers. They still had millions of them on the Western front. And yet they surrendered while they were on foreign soil. They had a fleet which they had spent years and years and years to build and it flew the white flag without firing a shot."

"I cannot believe that these great stores of ammunition and shells were wasted. In addition to the bravery of the American doughboy that arrived in France and got into action in numbers about the 15th of July and turned the tide and drove the Germans back, in addition to his bravery and his almost reckless spirit of determination, for which the praise cannot be too high, I say in addition to that, I believe there was one other factor that brought this war to an end at least one year before the most optimistic of us had dared to hope for. One other factor, and that was that Germany, her general staff, knew that back of the 200,000 or 300,000 Americans that really got into big action, and back of the 2,000,000 in France, was another 2,000,000 ready; and despite the fact that we had practically no artillery of American make on the Western front, that there was a great stream of American-made artillery on the way. And it is my conviction that the German staff knew that if they prolonged the war into 1919, they were inviting, not certain defeat, but certain annihilation."

"We are asked to pay for things that were never used; we are asked to pay for shells that never were fired; for cannon that never reached the battlefront, but we are asked to pay for those things that helped in a major way to bring this war to an end in 1918 instead of 1919. And the bringing of this war to an end twelve months before we could logically look for it means that we are asked to pay for the lives of 100,000 or 200,000 American boys who would have died on foreign soil had the war continued another year."

SLEEPING DOGS

"Ah, I'm coming around fine," was his thought. The next moment he opened his eyes. Slowly he sat up. He rose to his feet. He raised his hand to his head. He found his hair thickly matted with blood. He felt and discovered that blood was thick upon his neck where it had run in a stream and congealed in heavy splotches. He shook himself like an angry bear and he growled deeply within himself.

The door creaked and was pushed, open. Jerry crouched ready to spring, his powerful body throbbing electrically in a suddenly revived fitness for a struggle. Then he relaxed again.

Lucy stood in the doorway. The moon was clear of clouds, the moonlight flooded over her. It made a silver pathway across the floor to the bunk.

"Lucy—" wonderingly gasped Jerry.

"Yes," breathed the girl. She went toward the man. She slipped. She rubbed her foot over the slippery spot, a dull patch in the moonlight, and bending, she scrutinized it sharply.

"Blood!" all at once she cried out. She raised her eyes and peered into Jerry's face. "Blood!" she again exclaimed. Her hand reached out and clutched at his arm. "It's thick all over your face."

"I know," responded Jerry. Continuing passionately, "They've done more than merely give me this," he said.

"More?"

"They've robbed me. The minister left twenty-five hundred dollars in my care. They've taken it, those fellows that were after me down at your house this afternoon."

"Why did you let them do it?"

"They broke in here while I was asleep, they hit me before I could help myself."

"Yes, but—but—"

"Why did I let that fellow do that this afternoon, you mean?"

"Yes, yes, that's it. This robbery—well—that's as it is. But—oh, Jerry, why are you—were you such a—?"

"A coward, eh?"

"Oh," moaned the girl.

"Listen. A couple of months before I was born my father and mother fought off the sheriff and a posse from their cabin. A couple o' the sheriff's men was killed. My dad was strung up, but my mother was let off. She had done no shootin', but they let her go mostly on account o' the baby that was comin'. Anyway, the baby, that is, I, was born with the fear in the very soul o' me o' gettin' in the power o' the law; with the fear in every drop o' blood, in every fiber o' me, o' killin' some one. With the everlastin' fear o' my tremendous strength and ferocious temper always grippin' me on account o' the other fears, I was never out o' the stew o' bein' a terrible coward."

"But why have you never told me this before? Why did you not tell this afternoon?" Her inflections declared that her feeling was that what he said was a thing hard to believe.

"Telling without proving—what good would that have done?" laughed Jerry. His tones were such as made it evident he had caught in her tones the sound of incredulity.

"That dog, these men?"

"There was no dog. These men once saw me takin' a lickin'. They belonged to a gang that afterwards used to call me names and throw things at me. The gang pestered me out o' camp. Mouse today thought he'd show himself smart by bullyin' me on top o' my showin' myself so strong."

Jerry paused. Something was growing in him. Lucy breathed hard.

"I'll stand lickin's. But I won't stand bein' disgraced," declared Jerry. "By robbin' me they have put a mark of dishonor on me. It's like I betrayed my trust. The man became deeply stern. "Doin' what's right is more to me than law or all that sort o' thing. I'll follow them—"

"You mean—?"

"And I'll find them, too."

"I have seen," the girl cried, seizing upon this mood in Jerry with an almost frenzied gratification as the reason for telling him something important.

"And when I've found them I'l the money back or I'll kill both."

"I know where they are," ex Lucy. She was in a fervor. This as the man should be, as the man loved should be.

"Is it true? Yes?"

"Come quick," was the girl's sponse. Her cry was like the sound bugle call.

Together they sprang into the o Five minutes later they drew up front of a cabin on the outskirts of town.

"There," pointing to the struc standing well in the fringe of the he woods, "There in that deserted sh are the fellows you want," she said.

"Get away from here, Lucy," orde the man almost roughly. "There' bullets flying soon."

The man strode forward. He w straight up to the door and struck u it hard three or four times. His bl made the door shake and the sou rang through the empty streets stret ing at the back like the blows of a ha mer on an anvil.

"Open!" he shouted.

A while he waited. He heard noth from within. He renewed his assau upon the door. The shanty shook und the blows of his mighty fists.

All at once he heard Nutty's vo uttering snarlingly, "Get away fr there, or I'll shoot through the doo This was followed by horrible oat sizzled forth in the dreadful snarls Nutty.

"Shoot!" hoarsely whispered Mou "Kill him. Then we can run for it fore the whole town comes gap round."

"You cowardly robbers and murd ers," cried Jerry, hurling his weig against the barrier. "You lyi sneaks! Shoot! I'll get you anyway

A shot rang out and the bullet stu sharply in Jerry's side as it cut along rib. Another bullet, but it did n strike.

A roar came from Jerry like the ro of an angry bull. He drew back an then charged as though shot from catapult. He struck the door with a his battering power. It came off on h hands and he threw it inward as a bo might throw a kite. Two shots ran out. Both men were shooting. Ther was a stinging in the shoulder. On bullet had struck. The flash of th guns told him the whereabouts of hi foes. Jerry leaped forward in a swif spring and in an instant he had Mous in his hands. It was but one wrench h gave, and the villain was down and out Looking about, Jerry saw something i the gloom, or rather heard it, scurrying for the door. Grasping up the body o Mouse he hurled it at the fleeing figure. The heavy form of his erstwhile comrade struck Nutty and threw him against the doorjamb at the instant upon which he shot again, and just a he was about to take the last step to get into the open and so on to the fair way of making his escape. Before he could recover, Jerry was upon him. Jerry seized the wretch and stepped outside. He swung him once about his head and dashed him to the ground, senseless.

A half-dozen men had come together and three times as many were running up. Friskie put his hand on Jerry's shoulder where Jerry was kneeling beside Nutty and going over the unconscious body with his hands in a rapid search.

"What's goin' on here?" this man asked of Jerry in sharp officiousness. Jerry ran a last investigating hand over the prostrate form. "'Taint on this one," he muttered. Rising, "Out o' my way!" he said to a cluster of men crowding upon him. Pushing through them he strode forward and into the cabin.

"Well, I'll——," began several.

"Ev'dently Jerry is finishin' what somebody else started. What say, Friskie?" sardonically spoke a voice. It came from Pinkie, shoving himself to the fore. "And believe me," he continued, addressing the others present, "when you get to know the facts o' ittle affair you'll be sayin' it's all so far as Jerry is concerned."

I saw them go into this place, then I went back to call up a lot of you men to get them. But first I just had to have a look into Jerry's place. I opened the door and there was Jerry standing in the middle of the floor. He was awful hurt. He had just come to from being unconscious, or something like it. I brought him here, and—well, that's all."

Jerry was coming out of the cabin. The lights of the torches which some one had brought were turned upon him. He was covered with blood from head to foot. In his hand he held a bag.

"This is it," he said. "I'm sorry they took it. I'm sorry for the whole thing." His voice rose. There was in it a note of plaintiveness so deep that it defied fathoming. "Why didn't they leave me alone?"

Influenza, the International Ill

e Deadly Infection Is Sweeping Over Many Mission Fields of the World

E CALL it "flu." In China, where, it is said, the disease started, not all know that exive, easy term which the press of Western world has so glibly coined. of the missionaries in North China es the letter of a Chinese primary her and student of English who never heard the word "flu," or inza. However, he has an apt and able substitute, as you will agree the following:

> My Dear Pastor: Are you well, dear pastor? I think to open school, there was no one in my school: be- e they were getting pest. In six they were coming six or seven. They pest again, therefore I write you so ly. I beg your pardon. School boy dead one, but his father was only son, and school girl was only dead but her father was only one daugh- I am very sorry for the act. Give me remember to your whole ily. Yours truly, C. K."

rance, now turning to reconstruction rehabilitation, is handicapped and ayed. Everywhere the "flu" breaks in the over-crowded towns, in the tered homes of the country, in the aining camps, and in the hospitals.

n Italy the "pest" is also wideead, and fatal in a large percentage the cases. It has reached the coun- districts as well as the towns.

And Russia! Of course, Russia has escaped. Russia always has every- ng in a superlative degree. There is half-way work, no omissions—from anny to revolution, from war to rvation and disease. It is needless to y that the "flu" has a firm and fruit- place in Russia.

We in America who have 300,000 ore casualties from the "pest" than om the war can perfectly understand e universal language of the "flu."

MANY missionaries are speaking this universal language. H. W. Appenller of Chemulpo, Korea, a town of ,000 people, writes: "We have been aving a terrible time with influenza. Chemulpo they have been dying at e rate of over 70 a day."

Dr. Arthur H. Norton of the Method- t Mission in Haiju, Korea, writes: We've been passing through the most ying sort of times. Influenza has ruck us and bids fair to become uniersal. Nearly every one is sick, and ere are few to care for them. One of ur native helpers and his little baby re dead. Another's wife has died and e and his little baby girl will probably oon follow. Our hospital preacher's ife is dead, and he and his mother are own with the epidemic. It seems alost hopeless to try to treat these peole in their homes. Our hospital staff eing sick we were unable to treat uch in the hospital, otherwise I beieve we could have saved some of the [illegible]

"One of the most difficult things about he situation is that the Koreans have n insane notion that fresh air is not ood for them.

B. H. Paddock of the mission at Yenping, Fukien, China, writes: "The influenza has been prevalent here as well as in so many other parts of the world; many schools have had to suspend work; we had to for about a week; but it was of a much milder type than in many other places."

REV. R. MOE of the mission at Tuguegarao in the Philippine Islands writes: "The Spanish influenza is with us under the name of 'trancazo.' Deaths are more numerous here because of the ignorance of the people. In Apari there have been as many as thirty deaths a day. Yesterday fourteen funerals passed our house. We need a good doctor with a heart of Christian love."

The reports from India indicate that the plague is even more widespread and fatal there.

Rev. W. L. Morgan, principal of the F. L. Crawford Boys' School at Vikarabad, Deccan, India, writes: "Now India is in the throes of an epidemic of influenza and pneumonia. It was brought in from Mesopotamia by returning soldiers. In the large cities are several hundred deaths daily due to the 100 to 300 per cent. increase in the cost of living and the consequent impoverished vitality of the people through starvation. Many people in our district are reported to be trying to live on the roots of grass and bushes. The monsoon rains were very late and we received only half the usual rain, which means famine.

"Our boys did not escape the influenza. When the sick people came flocking into the station and swamped Dr. Linn's hospital force, he called on the boys for volunteer assistance in the emergency. Three of our boys volunteered to carry medicine and nourishment to the villagers. Others are scouring the country round about for eggs to nourish the sick. Others are taking a course in practical grave-digging. Over thirty of the schoolboys thus contracted influenza."

Later, Mr. Morgan writes: "Yesterday afternoon I attended a double funeral of two of our evangelists who had been stricken at their posts. Two children from the Girls' School were buried in the morning. To date fourteen evangelists have died and the outlying districts are not yet heard from. The death rate is ten to twenty times greater than normal in India."

FROM Colaba, Bombay, J. W. Robinson writes: "We are having a frightful epidemic of influenza here that is much more serious than the most virulent outbreaks of the black plague or cholera we have ever had. From reports that come to me I fear that our losses by death will approximate our number of baptisms. In the Central Provinces alone three of our Conference members have died. In a large number of our workers' families either the mother or some of the children have been taken. In Bombay the daily death toll went up from 70 a day to as high as 780, and in Poona from 10 to 260. The government is doing all it can, as are all the missions and philanthropic bodies; but ignorance, poverty and fatalism make a condition that is difficult to help."

Complete Your Ford Car With Stewart Necessities

In your Ford you have the basis of a most reliable, satisfactory and thoroughly trustworthy car. What you need to do is complete it—give it the items of necessary equipment its maker could not install at the low selling price.

Surely you cannot afford to be without a speedometer—no other car is. And 95% of them have the Stewart Speedometer—it's the only speedometer as trustworthy as the Ford car itself.

And a weak, "buzzer" horn is a constant element of danger. It sounds louder in your seat than ten feet in front of the car. You need a Stewart Warning Signal. Its full tone can be heard a mile up the road. It never fails.

A "spotlight" is now considered a necessity. It keeps you out of ditches, it points out sharp turns ahead. It enables you to show motoring courtesy when passing other cars. The Stewart V-Ray Searchlight is the most popular everywhere, because it's more than a mere "spotlight." An intense beam of concentrated light is sent 1,000 feet ahead.

It's cheaper to buy a Stewart Autoguard now than to buy new headlights and fenders later on.

All Stewart Necessities are truly "custombilt." They are built up to a standard of quality, not down to a predetermined price. At all progressive accessory dealers.

The Sound Sleep of the Coward

SUNDAY. Jonah 1:5. "He lay and was fast asleep." "He was fast asleep." And yet that man was in flight from a duty which had been laid upon him by the Lord. He was traveling in the way of rebellion. He had shaken himself free from life's sanctities and he had turned his back upon the great white throne. And yet he could sleep, and his sleep was like infants' slumbers, soft and light. And he could do this while a tempest was shrieking across the deep! One might have expected that he would never sleep a wink. Surely his conscience would be thundering in his soul, and his agitated being would give his body no rest! Does not the divine Nemesis chase a deserter, and does it not prevent him from pitching his tent in quiet places and lying down in innocent sleep? Can bad men sleep while dutiful men are awake at hazardous posts? Yes, that seems to be the significance of the narrative. Jonah was a rebel, and yet he slept soundly in the unhallowed way of desertion.

Our great dramatists have usually troubled the sleep of their villains. The ill deeds of the villains march with them into their tent and chamber and goad them into fearful dreams. It was so with the Duke of Clarence: "Oh, I have passed a miserable night!" It was so with Richard III: "I did but dream! Oh, coward conscience, how thou dost afflict me!" It was so with Lady Macbeth: "Here's the smell of the blood still!" And so it is with all Shakespeare's villains. Their sleep is troubled; the sword of judgment gleams through their dreams. They have followed evil ways of their own devising and they have lost the precious gift of restful sleep.

And yet I think it is a worse penalty when we have sinned and retained the power of sleep, when we can lie down in undisturbed rest as though we had just returned from a healthy walk in paths of righteousness. The most appalling judgment of sin has been inflicted when we become "past feeling." But it is the comfort of the opium-eater, it is the sleep of the benumbed, it is the restfulness of death. Let us clearly understand the possibility that lies in our hands; we can live wickedly into a debased contentment; we can drug ourselves into apathy. But how wretched is the contentment! How tragically small is our world! Our comfort is drowsiness mistaken for happiness; it is the fetid air of a tiny room mistaken for the vital air of the mountains. J. H. J.

The Habits of Jesus

MONDAY. Luke 22:39. "As his custom was, unto the Mount of Olives." I suppose Jesus could have found God in the streets of Jerusalem as well as in the silences of the Mount of Olives. I suppose it is true that God is everywhere. I suppose we can say with the poet:

> "To me remains no place nor time;
> My country is in every clime;
> I can be calm and free from care
> In any place, since God is there."

I suppose it is possible for one to pray and to keep a quiet heart in a crowded street car, or in the factory, or like Brother Lawrence in the kitchen, but Jesus made it the habit of his life to seek solitude, and to discover God for himself; and what Jesus did all great leaders have done. William E. Gladstone had his place of retreat in the House of Parliament, and Abraham Lincoln found it necessary while carrying the burden of the State to find a place of repair. It was in the wilderness alone that Moses was prepared for his great patriotic duty, and in the silence of Arabia Paul thought and prayed out his Gospel. These are days when men and women are breaking down all around us. Men and wo

The wear and tear, the countless irritations, the physical and nervous exhaustion of a teacher's life, have their parallel in the vexations of family life. Our behavior under these conditions is the acid test. Has salvation come to our house? C. C. A.

The Power Behind Nature

WEDNESDAY. Ps. 93:1. "The world also is established, that it cannot be moved." Evolution does not eliminate God from the universe. All men will not affirm that the doctrine of evolution has been indisputably established; but it may at least be considered to be a working hypothesis. Properly considered evolution does not eliminate God; it simply shows God working

The Sepulcher Builders

THURSDAY. Luke 11 : 47, 48. "Woe unto you! for ye build the ulchers of the prophets, and your hers killed them. Truly ye bear wit- se that ye allow the deeds of your fa- rs: for they indeed killed them, and ye ild their sepulchers." That the Lord ould make the building of memorial pulchers for the ancient prophets a w ground of accusation against the wish hierarchy can be explained only the general basis of the charge of pocrisy which he has raised against em: their building these sepulchers to him only another proof of their sincerity. It would have been a laud- le undertaking, had they approached with penitent hearts and with a view make compensation in a manner for e appalling wickedness of their fore- thers. The memorial stones which ey raised would in that case have been n evidence that a new generation had rown up in the Holy Land, so dissimilar om the former that they were bent pon honoring those whom their fathers ad grossly dishonored. But the nation mong whom our Lord came to labor ad not undergone a change of heart. hat prophet-killing generation was till regarded by them as the expounders f the true religion. By raising monu- ents to the prophets whom their an- estors had slain the present generation erpetuated not so much the memorial f the prophets as of their ancestors.

That the spirit of the fathers lived till in the present generation, that the resent generation had as little regard or God who sent prophets to them, was to be shown in a most flagrant manner in a very short time. For these words of Jesus were spoken to his own uture murderers, and show that Jesus entertained no false hopes for his own uture among this people. W. H. T. D.

Christmindedness

FRIDAY. Phil. 2 : 5. "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." Jesus was a humble mind, tak- ng the form of a servant, the likeness of men, descending into the death of the cross from whence God hath highly exalted him. His children must take the downward way if they would walk with him on the highway of holiness. Have we entered into the fellowship of his sufferings, helped to fill up that which was lacking in his afflictions? Are we enjoying the hospitality of Christ's loving, gentle mind, living together with him in his heart of compassion? Then we are truly possessing the mind that was in Jesus. If we are in Christ and Christ in us, it is more than a partnership, it is an eternal marriage, united in one mind and two personalities.

Other minds touch and inspire you through speech and writing and friendship, but the mind of Jesus becomes your home, your guide, your teacher, your refuge, yea, your very self. His mind possesses infinite rooms where the soul roams and grows to be more and more like him who redeemed you and made himself your dwelling place.

The knowledge that we dwell in Christ and he in us is beyond demonstration to others. Sunlight cannot be proven by logic but by personal consciousness, by living reality. "We know that we know Him," by dwelling in his blessed thought, by feeling his everlasting arms, by loving and being loved.

In Christ we are members of a vast family who are our brothers, united to each other in indissoluble bonds and all to God; one in social Christian fellowship, one in aim, purpose and unending affection. Christ's mind is the author of nature, of all being, all worlds, all noble thought, and is the scource of eternal life. What a dwelling-place for the human heart! What an opportunity for almost infinite development during all the coming cycles!

Looking Unto Jesus

SATURDAY. Heb. 12 : 2. "Looking unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of our faith." A man's life is the transcript of his ideals, standards, vision. He works out inevitably in things about him the likeness of that which is in his soul. Hawthorne has given us an illustration in the value of environment for character-shaping in his story "The Great Stone Face." The boy who all his life gazed upon the image in the rock when to manhood grown was the replica of the image. Looking unto Jesus—we shall be like him. "Character is caught, not taught!" We reflect that which we see. We emulate that with which we are pleased. We appropriate that which we approve. Tell me what you like and I will tell you what you are. Tell me your favorite books, pictures, amusements, and you will furnish me an index to your soul and hand me the key to your character. Environment, tastes, desires are our choices. Character is crystallized choice.

Gounod had painted on his piano the head of the Master. "Before I begin to compose I look upon his face and his Spirit passes into me," said the composer. Sidney Smith, speaking of a friend, said "The ten commandments are painted on his countenance." "Moses wist not that his face shone." Others did. Men always may discern and take knowledge that we have been with Jesus. May our faces shine because we have subjected them to the Light of the World. May the scenery of heaven be ever in our mind's eye. The Scotchman, when asked if he knew where heaven is answered: "Man, I live there."

Peter saw the new heaven and the new earth. That was because he saw Jesus first. We, too, are looking for the new day, the new order, the Kingdom of God. We can only realize our hope by looking unto Jesus and being transformed unto his likeness, and our characters become the transcript of his character. It must be "Christ in us, the hope of glory." He must express himself through us, our thoughts, our speech and our lives. R. B.

PUFFED WHEAT

"The Boy That Night Ate the Last Puffed Grain"

At a house where I visited the hostess said to the writer, "We love Puffed Grains in our home, but somehow we don't use a large amount."

"Let us see why," I suggested.

Next morning she served Puffed Rice for breakfast, and the last grain was consumed. At noon she served Puffed Wheat in milk, and not a kernel left the table.

In the afternoon the daughter used two cups of Puffed Rice in candy. And the boy that night at bedtime ate the last Puffed Grain in the house.

That's All the Trouble

You will find that children eat all the Puffed Grains they get. The only limit when you serve them is the bottom of the dish.

These are airy, toasted bubbles, thin and flaky, puffed to eight times normal size. In form and flavor Puffed Grains are exquisite.

They are whole-grain foods—Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice. And children need whole grains.

They are steam exploded, shot from guns. By this unique process of Prof. Anderson every food cell is blasted. Thus digestion is easy and complete. No other process ever known so fits grain foods to digest.

Don't you think it a vast mistake when such foods are served sparingly, and lesser foods take their place?

Springtime and Salads

By Marion Harland

WITHOUT knowing why a sort of general good-for-nothingness and lack of appetite fell upon families and communities with the early springtime, our forebears gave it the generic name of "spring fever," although what we have learned to call the "temperature" was subnormal and the pulse sluggish. With a vague idea that the long winter had engendered "bile," they resorted to cooling medicines to restore "tone" to the system. We laugh at Mrs. Squeer's daily doses of molasses-and-sulphur to the hapless inmates of Dotheboys Hall as senseless and cruel. The sexagenarian of our day can recall the like régime in American households. Loving mothers held to their faith in the same within the last half century. Other "cooling" drugs were administered, usually in the form of beverages. Sassafras tea for the youngsters, sassafras beer for the adults, and cream-of-tartar lemonade [for all ages were in high repute among domestic curatives and prescribed freely by physicians.

We of a wiser age trace the prevalent languor and disrelish for wholesome food to the winter dietary of salt and fatty foods, starchy vegetables and scarcity of fresh fruits and other green and growing things that expel biliary secretions and keep the natural functions of the body in order.

In the list of these benevolent agencies, salads hold the place of honor. It promises well for the health of the rising race that this order of foods is no longer rightly esteemed by the wealthy alone, but is growing rapidly in favor among the mighty middle class, who are the makers of a nation's habits and beliefs. In scores of families sensible mothers have substituted salads in tempting variety for pies and rich puddings.

In the selection of recipes for salads I have such households in mind. I would encourage a taste for what stimulates the sluggish appetite and also dispels biliary humors which breed illness.

French Salad Dressing

Rub the bowl in which the dressing is to be mixed, with the inside of a cut onion or garlic. Then pour in six tablespoonfuls of the best salad oil and two of vinegar. Stir and beat these until they mingle freely and add one even teaspoonful of paprika (or white pepper) and half as much salt. Beat well and set on ice until you are ready to pour it over the salad.

Mayonnaise Salad Dressing

This has been called "the queen of salad dressings," and deserves the title when properly made.

Into a chilled soup-plate or shallow vegetable-dish drop the yolks of two eggs carefully drained of every drop of the whites; add a teaspoonful of lemon juice and stir well with a silver fork until thoroughly mixed. Next, add gradually, mixing as you do this, about a dozen drops of the very best salad oil, wh has been set upon ice. Stir steadily the time, and as the mixture begins thicken increase the quantity of oil u you have used half a pint. Season, you stir, with a half-saltspoonful of s the same of fine sugar, a dash of papri and a generous tablespoonful of lem juice. When done, the mayonna should be like rich cream in consisten

Some cooks add a saltspoonful mustard instead of the sugar, and vi gar in place of lemon-juice. Cons your taste in these particulars. Eve thing used in making the mayonna should be very cold.

Sour Cream Salad Dressing

A Laundry Box-Shelf

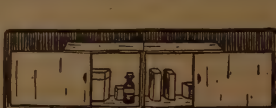
By Laura A. Kirkman

TED'S mother had a great deal of trouble with water bugs in her laundry. "They seem to live on the little shelf above the tubs, where I keep my soap and bluing," Fred overheard her telling his father.

Ted said nothing, but he began to ask himself at once what he could do to help his mother get rid of these pests.

At last he hit upon an idea: "I'll nail two starch-boxes, with sliding covers, on their sides, close together, on the shelf—and then if mother will keep the sliding doors closed, the water bugs can't get in to the soap!" he said.

Ted decided to make this box-shelf and get it up without telling his mother anything about it, so that she would be surprised when she discovered it.



Of course it took several days to complete the work, because Ted painted the two boxes, and the paint had to dry. The boxes were oblong, and he put them on the shelf end to end on their sides, so that one of the sliding covers pulled out to the left and one pulled out to the right. He then nailed them to the shelf securely and put the bluing and starch in one of the compartments and the soap in the other.

You can imagine how pleased Ted's mother was when she discovered her new laundry shelf.

For India's Hungry Millions

NCLOSED please find $1 toward the Christian Herald India Famine Fund from an old soldier's w, who is provided for by the best rnment on earth, and wishes to and honor God for his rich bless- in that I am supplied with health food, and am so sorry for those so ted. It's so little, but many littles e a large fund to help with." This r came from Mrs. L. W. G., Independence, Iowa.

he littles do add up to much, and the am of dollars soon amounts into thou- ls, and the thousands go to buy bread, tens of thousands would still leave ger dominant over wide stretches of e famine-wasted Indian plains.

nother dollar came from a woman ty-four years old, who though of ll means, and doing her fair share in l's work at home, yet out of a great t felt moved to answer the cry of ia, and got a neighbor to send her ar, hoping that it might help some r child.

five dollar bill came from a hard- king creamery manager and his wife, who wrote that they "count it a privilege to be able to help this good Christian work." And another $5 from a member of a Ladies' Missionary Society, who wrote, "The Lord has blessed us wonderfully, and I want to use this small amount to help forward his kingdom."

Many letters have come bearing $10 and larger amounts, and nearly all, whether the gift is big or little, bear some message of interest in the great work of saving the starving of India. One letter is typical. A teacher of a Sunday school class of girls sent $11 which the class had raised, and closed her letter: "Wishing you godspeed in your noble endeavor to save humanity."

God is speeding the work. As in the past, so again today, he is using the Christian Herald Family to save precious lives and still more precious souls. No gift to such a cause can be extravagant, none can be too small to help.

Does Tartar Form On Your Teeth?

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

You Can Easily Prevent It

The film is the basis of tartar. It is that slimy film which you feel with your tongue, after it stays too long.

That film is the teeth's chief enemy. Most tooth troubles are due to it. For years it has been one of the greatest problems in dentistry.

It absorbs stains and becomes discolored. It causes tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Dentists call it "bacterial plaque," because millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Brushing does not end this film. The film is clinging. It gets into crevices, hardens and stays. So millions find that well-brushed teeth discolor and decay. Tartar and pyorrhea are not being prevented. Tooth troubles are constantly increasing.

Science, after years of effort, has found a way to combat this film. It has proved itself in many clinical tests, and to hundreds of thousands of people. Leading dentists all over America are urging its adoption.

It is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And we supply it for a home test to anyone who asks.

A Pleasant Test, and Free

Pepsodent is pleasant. Its effects are delightful. It will show you the way to a lifetime of clean, safe, filmless teeth.

It is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly combat it.

But pepsin alone is inert. It must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. So pepsin long seemed impossible.

Today it is possible, because science has discovered a harmless activating method. Five governments have already granted patents. That method, used in Pepsodent, has opened a new dental era.

Now that film can be constantly combated. Its ceaseless damage to the teeth can be prevented. Teeth can be really cleaned. See what that means to you and yours by trying it ten days.

Send this coupon for a 10-Day Tube.

Use it like any tooth paste and watch results. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the slimy film. See how teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

Those results mean that the film is conquered. See them, then decide for yourself their importance.

Our Risen Lord

Matt. 28 : 1-10

The Message of Easter, 1919

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph. D.

EASTER, 1919, will undeniably be kept, according to immemorial custom, as the festival of the Return of Spring as well as the anniversary of the opened tomb. The loveliness of the flowers, the harmonies of special music, the light and joy of the passing of winter harshness will not fail. New garments upon the bodies of men and women and children will signify a new start in the external phases of life. But will the essential message of the living Christ and the personal immortality of the human spirit "get across" into the consciousness of the people of our land and of all lands? Christmas leavened the world anew with the memorial of the Babe of Bethlehem, of the sacredness of childhood and of the joy of giving. Will Easter be as successful in calling universal attention to the living Lord and the unseen Kingdom?

Perhaps we need to revive some such custom as that of the Greek Church with its Easter form of greeting, the counterpart of our "Merry Christmas"—"The Lord is Risen," with its appointed response, "He is Risen Indeed." It might do a world of good if that interchange of expressions of Christian faith might be heard this year in the homes, on the streets and in shop and office and market-place. Will this Easter make the millions of bereaved people happier and surer of their loved one's safety and opportunity beyond the veil? Will it prepare our hearts for separations to come and for our own transition journey, which is so sure, soon or late?

Let us therefore make this a joyous but a serious, an all-important lesson.

Death and Christ

Death and Christ are two words that do not seem to fit together. Since the resurrection of Christ the term death has been indeed retained because of its usefulness in marking the passing of the physical; but it has been changed in meaning, subtly and yet radically. In the old use of the word a dead Christ is unthinkable,—the ancient Jews were right in that judgment, but wrong in believing that Jesus of Nazareth was dead. His disciples, led by the Holy Spirit, took the proper reaction to the alternative: either Jesus was not the Christ or is not dead. They said, "It was impossible that he should be holden of death." There was a marvelous change in that primitive group from the scattering, faithless, disappointed fugitives of Good Friday to the joyous, united, believing witnesses of Pentecost. The difference was—Easter! Christ was risen, bringing life and immortality to light, and the Power of his Resurrection had seized their souls, transfiguring their whole attitude to life and faith and the future.

To the pagan world death was a hideous and repulsive figure, always blotting out the beauty and joy of life. To the Christian the angel of death is indeed an angel, a glorious winged messenger announcing the call to a larger and higher realm of life that is life indeed.

This does not mean that we are to love death, or to try to ignore its darker side in the least. It only means we are to remember, as we are apt to forget, that there is a brighter side, that the pain and weakness, sorrow and loss is not all, not really half the story. There is for the Christian believer an abundant entrance into life eternal.

Life and Christ

Because He lives, we shall live also! How wondrously the Scriptures of the New Testament identify the fate of the Christian with the destiny of Christ Jesus the Lord! We are his, indissolubly. What happened to the Son of God will also be the blessed portion of all his faithful disciples when they pass from mortal ken. He is risen; we shall rise, is the assurance. But it has a corollary for the present experie the believer. Because he is rise

The Spirit of Our Boys

HE work of the Sunday school is tested by its product. From the Sunday school of which I am su- intendent, 250 of our boys have gone service. The letters from these constitute a living commentary on worth of Christian training when mitted to the acid test of absence n home and new surroundings. The ers that follow are but a few of scores ch have come to me from these ndid fellows.

he first is from Corporal Edwin M. rwood, 6th regt., 75th company, U. Marines. It is dated Hönningen on Rhine, January 19:

I have heard of the celebrations in States over the news of the armis- and while we were all very glad, we could not really believe it for a le at least. My division, the second, been up on the firing lines in the onne Forest, and had kept on the s of the fleeing Huns for eleven days nights without signs of relief.

With every bursting shell the cas- ty list grew longer, and coupled with continuous rainy weather, things tainly looked mighty blue; but the it kept up, and we knew that the my could not hold out much longer. heard rumors about an armistice, later they were confirmed, but the ll fire continued right up until the t minute of the eleventh hour on the venth day of November.

"It seemed strange indeed not to hear rumble of the guns, but we still held positions and lay in our dugouts iting for orders to go to the rear. We ved back slightly and camped in the ek woods and we were able to light s at night to keep warm—something t had not been done for four years a half. This was practically all of celebration, and on the 18th of No- mber we started on our triumphal rch to the Rhine, acting as part of army of occupation. Hiking through rthern France, Belgium and Luxem- g and into Germany was indeed e task, and we saw a good many hts. Each day saw us twenty to rty miles nearer our destination, and the twelfth day of December we ught our first glimpse of the wonder- River Rhine. On the thirteenth we ssed the river before daylight, and so as I can understand were the first nerican troops to cross the river.

"This little town we are staying in about 4,000 population, and the ople treat us very good. They have en hit hard by the sacrifices made in e war and seem to understand what y must face. Food is very scarce d they have their meat and bread al- wance, which is very scarce. We are ing the front rooms in nearly all houses the quartering of troops for sleeping rposes, etc., so we are pretty well set r the winter. There are a number of mors about being relieved from the Vatch on the Rhine,' but they have no cking. We are patiently waiting for e news to pack up and return, for the od old U. S. A. will look mighty good us.

"I have gone through three hard bat- es and took a good many chances, and n proudly say that Our Father in eaven had a hand in guiding me rough safely. There have been more hristians made spiritually in one hour the battlefield amid shell and ma- ine-gun fire than any minister could ver make, for there has not been one llow up there who was not continually ffering prayers, and if by chance he was ounded he still had Him in front to ut his trust in. We are all thankful at it is all over.

"Today is election day in Germany nd I hope they get together in some ay to form a government and stop heir revolution. Today being Sunday, am glad to write you these few lines. our old Sunday school scholar,

"EDWIN M. SHERWOOD."

Another of our boys who won his hon- rs at Château-Thierry was Herbert Nestler of the Signal Corps. This boy was twice wounded in dangerous service. The letter is dated January 8. He says:

"It is Wednesday evening, and my thoughts wander to prayer meeting at Bushwick Avenue M. E. Church, even though I didn't attend regular.

"I have a younger brother who is in service with the Navy. He has been across and back over seven times. He is located at the Brooklyn Navy Yard at present. I guess he had Christmas dinner at home with mother and father.

"You ask me to explain how I was wounded. Here goes: It was at a place called Château-Thierry, France. I was installing and repairing wireless and telegraph communications from a trench very near the enemy. The wires for these operations are run under the ground at the top of the trenches. There were about six Signal Corps men with me. Out from this number I was picked to find out just how these wires were run. So I put myself together and waded through No Man's Land, crawling all the way on my stomach. I reached the terminal and pulled my wire-cutters and pliers from under my coat and started to work. With me I also had a telephone field set and started to test the lines. I finished my job, when in another second a shot passed through my hand. I lay low on the ground, grasped my .45-calibre automatic and just barely caught the big Hun trying to steal away. I let him have the full contents of the magazine, which totaled seven shots, and he fell just like the rest.

"I was able to use my right hand, so I lost no time in erecting a telegraph line and sent a message to the nearest post, and within thirty-five minutes aid reached me and I was brought to a Red Cross station, at which I received fairly good treatment.

"I was well and around in a few days and sent back to get another crack at some more Huns. Was in the trenches two days when I received a shot in the left leg, and that finished me. I was then sent across to the dear old U. S. A. Was in two camps, all within three months. I am here instructing officers how to shoot this Colt .45-calibre, which job I don't care for at all. Well, this cozy bunk of mine is almost speaking to me to come in, so I'll say 'Au revoir, but not good-by.' As ever,

"HERBERT NESTLER.

"Would appreciate your sending me a Testament."

Over 240 testaments have gone from the school to the boys. Christian boys, like Cromwell's Ironsides, make valiant soldiers.

A $1,000 Hen Club

WHAT is a $1,000 poultry club? Ten girls and boys in Litchfield County, Conn., have formed one, and it has for its aim the clearing of $1,000 in one year on the poultry owned by the club members.

The ten youths are members of boys' and girls' clubs, supervised by the State Agricultural College. They own altogether 350 birds, and they are determined to realize their expectations. The members decided that an extension school would be of assistance in their work, and, undeterred by the fact that a "junior extension school" had never been conducted in Connecticut before, asked for one from the State College and got it.

Severe Air Test Shows Dependability of Spark Plugs With No. 3450 Insulator

TO guard against loss of power and engine efficiency due to leakage at spark plugs, Champion Spark Plugs are submitted to a severe test in our Air Test Machine.

Oil is poured at the point where shell and insulator meet, and a pressure of 140 pounds per square inch of air is forced up through the base of the shell.

The absence of air bubbles means 100% Champion Dependability against leakage.

Sunday School Commission to the Near East

TO MAKE a comprehensive survey of the fearful conditions prevalent in Armenia, Syria, Persia and Greece, nineteen men, leaders in religious activities, especially of Sunday schools, are on their way to the Near East under the auspices of the American Committee for Relief in the Near East. The leader of the party is H. C. Jaquith of New York, assistant executive secretary of the American Committee for Relief in the Near East.

At Aleppo the party will divide into two groups. One will cover a wide territory by crossing Armenia on mules to the Black Sea, while the other group will take the railroad to Smyrna and Constantinople.

The Sunday School Commission, besides observing conditions in the Near East, will supervise the distribution of the relief supplies which have gone out during January and February and are to continue to flow to the Near East.

In a report presented at a conference of the Sunday School Commissioners, two days before sailing, it was shown that the Sunday schools had donated more than two million dollars for the cause, those schools represented by the commissioners being particularly active in the Near East relief work.

At the same meeting a committee was appointed to formulate and report on a plan of organization for Sunday school work regarding the Near East. The committee decided on three articles:

That a general committee be formed consisting of one representative from each religious denomination, the present group being the nucleus.

That an executive committee of seven be named.

That a twelve-month secretary be secured and known as the Sunday School Secretary, and also as the Secretary of the Executive Committee.

Present-Day Crusaders

Medical and Missionary Expedition for Relief of Armenia and Syria

THE Crusaders of the Middle Ages died in the great religious effort of winning the Holy Sepulcher from the Turks; some present-day crusaders live and work to save the people of the Holy Land from perishing at the hands of the Turks. For many years the Turks have persecuted, killed and massacred the Armenians and kindred Christian races in the Near East. During the war the lengths to which the Turks went in their frenzy to rid their empire of the Armenians are horrible in the extreme. "Turkey for the Turks" was their cry, and, aided and abetted by the Germans, they carried on a fearful persecution, of which the whole world has heard.

Now the opportunity has come to us to aid in the saving of the subject races of the Near East. The Mediterranean Sea is navigable again, and relief workers and supplies are passing through to the districts of most need. Five contingents of men and women have sailed for Constantinople during January and February under the direction of the American Committee for Relief in the Near East.

The Red Cross donated equipment worth more than a million dollars for equipping fifteen hospitals. These fifteen hospitals were American army hospitals in France, and have been turned over to the American committee for a nominal sum. They will be transported to the Near East immediately. Fifty-four nurses and thirty physicians have accompanied the relief expedition and will begin a work of mercy upon reaching their destination.

Fifty of the former missionaries of the Near East have returned to take up the fight against great odds for the lives of their Armenian friends. They will be of the utmost value to the other workers, as they know the language, the people and the country. Herculean tasks await these crusaders. They will have to battle with disease, starvation and misery of all kinds.

In addition to the nurses, physicians and missionaries, there are specialists in agriculture, reconstruction aids and relief workers.

A Layman on Christian Unity

YOUR editorial of February 22 n the subject of Christian Unity, notice that you speak of denomi-nal differences being wiped out the pressure of the new public ion and the entirely new conditions ing through the world, and you say, nere is higher criticism? It is shriv-up."

he position of the Christian Herald niformly so sound that this treat-t of the subject perplexes me from standpoints: 1. Higher criticism ot a matter of denominationalism. igher criticism and all other attacks vangelical religion are not shriveled s I see it, but more aggressive than before.

most heartily concur with you in general policy and idea of unity of churches, and believe myself that e is really no fundamental need tever for the maintenance of the rate uniforms for Methodist, Bap-Episcopalian, Lutheran and Pres-erian regiments. But granting this, correct, as a matter of theory, to k of higher criticism, which means modern day scepticism, as denomi-onalism? My idea, which I respect-y submit to you (as an old man with h experience), is this: namely, that whole range of so-called higher ics and disciples of the so-called Lib-Religion, Unitarians either in name in fact, Theosophy, New Thought, istian Science, Mormons, Russellites latter under a temporary cloud), preaching now in halls and theatres on street corners with great activity earnestness; they are spending much ney in advertising and in propa-da by literature through the mails. y occupy the same place toward the ngelical churches that Sanballat tried ccupy toward Nehemiah; they say, t us come in and build with you; are all in the presence of the war ing out lines and becoming one; let ones be bygones."

s it not true that the whole world rawn to a crisis on one point—those o recognize atonement made for the s of men by the shed blood of Christ his personal and vicarious assump-n of their sins as the Son of God taking n himself the sins o the whole world; those on the other side, who dis-ard him entirely or regard him as a at teacher, a philosopher, or admit t he is a son of God in the same way t all other men are?

s it not true that all people who ognize Jesus Christ are gradually separating on one side or the other on the question of his deity and atonement? Is it not true that any unity of the evangelical Church must come on a common recognition of this platform—one in itself of such tremendous importance that the differences in the form of baptism or the powers and authorities of elders, overseers, deacons or bishops are in comparison trivial?

I hope I make myself clear. My desire is to draw your attention and the powerful support of the Christian Herald to my contention that the Church militant must be united on the one cornerstone, and that no one can come in to break up the homogeneity of this Church Unity by any false theories of redemption by works, or a second period of probation, or universality of redemption, or any theories outside of the Holy Scripture.

In my own city — which is a large industrial community — there is no shriveling up of the higher criticism, although the Christian church work of this city is worthy of all commendation, in its vigorous support of every form of public welfare and philanthropy, both domestic and foreign.

JAMES E. BOOTH, said by Rochester bankers to be the oldest bank president or head of a financial institution in the United States, passed away shortly after his ninety-second birthday at Rochester, N. Y., on February 7. He virtually died in the harness, as president of the Monroe County Savings Bank. He was a native of New York City, where he was born December 29, 1826. On his ninetieth birthday, he related to a little group of his friends some interesting reminiscences of his early life in New York. He said: "When I lived there, Fifth Avenue was a wilderness, being rough and rocky. Sixth Avenue was a vegetable garden. When Fourteenth Street was laid out, people scoffed and said it would never be built up. What is now Brooklyn was almost a barren tract, with a residential section called Brooklyn Heights. Hoboken was a pleasure-ground laid out as a park, with hotels, drives, etc. Drinking water was carried around in carts." Mr. Booth voted for Zachary Taylor in 1848, and has voted in every presidential election since.

It was ile she was on a turn visit to her tive land that rs. Parker had the nor of helping to rm the society at is to hold a bilee celebration.

She is the widow the late Bishop dward W. Parker India. No hus-nd and wife ever d a nobler rec-d of missionary hievement.

Mrs. Lois Lee Parker

They left New England soon after their marriage in 1859 and were one hundred days reaching India. Mrs. Parker at once began a work for girls that has not yet come to an end, and hundreds, even thousands, of the girls of India might well rise up and call her blessed. Her work has been recognized in many ways in India.

Recently there was dedicated in Lai Bagh in India a great high school named for Mrs. Parker. In 1916 there was dedicated the Lois Lee Parker School for girls, which is the outgrowth of the school for girls Mrs. Parker started in the early days of her lifelong missionary effort. There is a large and fine school for girls in Morabad that was founded by her, and no man can measure the full extent of her noble work in India.

It is a record of achievement that brings joy to the sunset years of her life, and that will make her one of the most honored of women in America.

AS ABRAM traveled from Haran toward Canaan the Lord appeared to him in the plain of Moreh and repeated the promise he had given to Abram at Haran. And Abram built there an altar unto the Lord, and as he journeyed on, at every place where he pitched his tent he built also an altar and called upon the name of the Lord. The altar and the promise are inseparable. If our home lacks an altar we need not wonder if it also lacks that overshadowing of God's Spirit which makes every sunrise a promise and every twilight a benediction. Build your altars where your tent is pitched and call upon the Lord, and you will receive his promise, for today, for tomorrow and for eternity.

Individual requests for prayer have been received as follows:

D. D. McI. requests prayer that the making of wildcat whisky be suppressed, and that sin of the sabbath-breaking may cease.

Will Mrs. S., who asked prayer for healing of injured spine, send her address to this office?

S. E. M. asks prayer that she may do more efficient work in Sunday school, and that she may obtain work to help the sister with whom she is living.

Sixty-two persons ask prayer for bodily healing for themselves or others.

Five ask prayer for healing of the mind for themselves or others.

Eight parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; three wives, for conversions of husbands; two persons ask prayer for the conversion of brothers; one for the conversion of a sister; one for the conversion of a father; seven for the conversion of friends or relatives; one mother for the conversion of a daughter; and three ask prayer for their own conversion.

Fourteen ask prayer for spiritual blessing for themselves or others.

Eight ask prayer for the improvement or restoration of sight.

Two ask prayer for the improvement or restoration of hearing.

ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE GREAT WAR 1914 1919

The Christian Herald feels that it is doing a timely service for its readers in publishing and offering a splendid War History.

General Pershing's Own Story of American operations in France is given in full, with his glowing tribute to our fighting boys. From a literary, authoritative and pictorial standpoint we cordially recommend this book to our readers as a compact record of the Great War and at moderate cost.

We See a Picture of an intrepid American airman bringing down from the clouds to destruction a German adversary. Our splendid birdmen brought down 845 enemy machines in their sky duels. The history gives many thrilling and never-to-be-forgotten stories of great heroism in the air and on land and sea. Detailed descriptions of the battles that made our gallant sons immortal are unfolded by eye-witnesses, who tell simply but impressively what they saw.

the editor-in-chief of this thrilling history of great world events, has done his work in a masterly manner and received invaluable assistance from governmental official sources, not only from our own but from the British, French and Canadian Governments.

The Greatest of All Dramas unfolds itself in the pages of this work, so intense with the thrilling stories of eye-witnesses, that the reader gasps at the tremendous and startling spectacles caused by this war of many nations. Actual photographs, many of them furnished from the records of the Allied Governments, embellish the work throughout and are in themselves a great pictorial history.

As the reader finds himself absorbed with the intense human interest unfolded in the hundreds of pages of clear text he suddenly comes to groups of pictures made from official photographs and finely printed on plate paper showing the men in the trenches, portraits of the famous leaders of Allied armies, "Going over the Top," the terrible implements of war such as tanks, submarines, dirigibles, battle airplanes, big guns, gas and flame attacks, transports, etc.

Read the Wonderful Story in this great work of Major Robert L. Denig of the U. S. Marines. It is interest-compelling in its simplicity, but represents the truest form of war history. His description of the Battle in Belleau Wood in those trying days of July, 1918, is an epic that will live in U. S. History and has been placed in the Historical Records of the Marine Corps at Washington. This history of the Great War is replete with authentic stories of the unforgetable events of the winning of Right over Might.

How complete is it? you ask. Right down to President Wilson sailing for France.

But Here is Our Further Promise to every one who purchases a copy of the History of the Great War for $2.50, postpaid, the Christian Herald will send a supplementary volume, bound in cloth, free of charge, to include the further history of the War since the signing of the armistice in November, 1918. This valuable supplement will not only include the report of the Peace Conference, but will have a new series of 32 pages of World Maps, in Colors, corrected as defined by the decisions of the Peace Conference and the terms of Peace, and bringing the World War down to the signing of the Peace Terms.

The big book is nearly ready and will be mailed soon, and the supplement will follow as soon as it is possible to complete it.

Eternal Life and How to Live It (Easter)

Christian Endeavor, B. Y. P. U. and Epworth League Topics. John 5 : 24; Eph. 2 : 1-10

LIFE is abounding energy. Life is ambition, it is driving force, it is love and intense desire, and the things it holds today are the things it has forgotten tomorrow. With all its power, with all its glory, our earthly life is essentially transient, its glories fade, its power is impotence at last, its possessions fall away. But eternal life goes on. Its power increases, its glories grow more radiant, its possessions more precious. Eternal life comes to us through the death and resurrection of the Christ. Because he lives we shall live, we do live; for eternal life began in us when we accepted Christ and were accepted of him. If then we would live the eternal life we must seek those things which are eternal. Pride, lust, acquisitiveness for selfish ends, power, authority, satire, needless pleasure, self-satisfaction, the adulation of those who find us useful, all these things are fleeting, elements of the dust of earth. We may count them useless for eternal life. But kindness, cheerfulness, anxiety to serve, ability to comfort, pure thought, sweet speech, gentleness, fideltity to friend and purpose, and above all faith that grips the hand of God, these are spiritual; and our earthly life, when it includes these, is linked with eternal life. On Palm Sunday Jesus of Nazareth appeared to have everything a human life could desire. But in four short days it was gone. It was of the earth. But in the dawn of the next Sunday he rose from Joseph's tomb, the Saviour of mankind. Earth could not hold him. And in him we have eternal life. In one of his books J. G. Holland says "Life is before you, —not earthly life alone, but life—a thread running interminably through the warp of eternity."

Domestic Production of Potash. Statistics of potash production in the United States in 1918 show that total output was 192,587 short tons of potash materials, containing 52,135 short tons of actual potash. Last year's production was almost double that of 1917. About 75 per cent. of the total output came from natural brines, 55 per cent. coming from brines in Nebraska alone. For several years immediately preceding the European war the United States used annually an average of 240,000 short tons of actual potash. The 1918 production was therefore about 22 per cent of normal consumption. Imports during last year were very small. Because of the dull market prevailing during the latter part of 1918, producers had on hand January 1, 1919, crude potash to the amount of 60,426 tons.

Questions and Answers

MRS. L.S.H., Duvall, Washington. What can a Christian do in a situation like this: Supposing a rich, well-settled farm country, dotted with small towns, with several cities not far away. The people industrious, decent, well-to-do, intelligent, interest in having their children educated, supporting good schools in their communities, but on the whole very indifferent to religion. A crowd of young people growing to maturity who seldom enter a church, have no young people's societies, and spend the Sabbath in pleasure or work, and show signs of drifting into open defiance of God's laws and toward infidelity. A Christian may pray and labor, but when that does not seem to avail much, what then? Am I not right in my belief that, as God works mightily through chosen evangelists, it would be well for some of these to seek out such communities, instead of confining their services to cities and towns? Could these communities be won for Christ, with their families of children and young people, what a blessing it would prove!

ur correspondent has described conditions are found in many places. The churches spiritual reinvigoration and a new con- ation to cope with such a situation. Write to Parley E. Zartmann, Secretary Na- al Federation of Evangelists, Winona e, Ind., stating all the facts, and he will ise you. The local churches should unite r energies and their resources for a cam- n in which all may join, and especially ld they unite in earnest prayer that God be pleased to bless the effort to be made in souls for the Kingdom. The prepara- work is very important and should not neglected.

McK., Spokane, Wash. What do you think of the practice of using a dice box in a place of business? There is a law in this state against gambling. As this dice-throwing goes on openly, I infer that it is not regarded as gambling.

Dice are gambling implements, and if there n anti-gambling law in your state, you can bably learn from the authorities whether use of dice to which you refer is a violation hat law or not. They are used in barrooms poolrooms in gambling for drinks.

S. Corbett, Kirkwood, N. Y. I was very much interested in Courtenay Savage's article in the Christian Herald, February 22, in which he wrote of the wild pigeon, which has totally disappeared. As a boy I was always interested in the wild pigeon. Each spring they used to come in flocks, sometimes one hundred, again one thousand to five thousand. They would scatter and go from one field to another. Very few were killed by hunters in our neighborhood. I think in 1879 or 1880 I picked up a paper stating that in the town of South Bristol, Ontario County, New York, there were thousands of wild pigeons roosting. Next year I was in that town. I took pains to ask about them. The farmer I talked with said, "Look at that ridge, which is nearly three miles long, covered with oak trees." He said it was filled with birds. They commenced going out at daybreak and would not all get away till nine or ten o'clock. At about three they would commence coming back, and it took them until dark. He said that he had taken a torch and a bag and filled the latter with birds, as the trees were so full that the birds roosted almost down to the ground, so that he could easily knock them off with a stick. I have never seen one since, until one day in West Virginia I was talking about them, and a gentleman told me that there was just such a drove of them in that town at that time.

Our farmer friends and others living in the untry will be interested in Mr. Corbett's tter, as he seems to have been a close observer the wild pigeons, which have now apparently sappeared, from some mysterious cause.

J. A. S., Jonesboro, Tenn. The World Al- anac gives the following particulars concern- g the Hindenburg Line: "German prepara- on for a renewal of the Somme battle in 1917 as a strategic retreat to the Hindenburg ne, assumed to have been through Laon, La ère, St. Quentin, Cambrai and Lille, joining e old line at Vimy Ridge north of Arras. he retreat on a front extending from Arras to the Aisne was carried out in March, 1917. The Allied pursuit overtook the retreat. La Fère was rendered useless by French successes. St. Quentin was eliminated from the line in April, 1917. On March 21, 1918, when the Germans renewed their offensive, the Hindenburg Line, beginning at the north at Nieuport, went south through Lens, Croiselles, Bullecourt, Hermes, Epehy, Bellenglise, Essigny, and St. Quentin, La Fère, Anizy, and Craonne, to Rheims. The Allied armies, including American brigades under General Foch, began a counter movement in June, 1918 (at which time the Germans had swept west to Arras, Beaumont, Corbie, Hangard, Braches, Montdidier, Cambroun, Bailly, Courtil, Soissons, Troenes, Vaux, Château-Thierry, Dormans, Chatillon, and Thillois, to Rheims), and by September 22 the Soissons-Rheims salient had been wiped out, and from La Fère, through Laon, to Rheims, the Germans were gradually being pushed toward, and then across, the southern remnants of the Hindenburg Line. Near the close of hostilities the entire German first line had come to be known as the Hindenburg Line.

A friend sends us these dainty verses, entitled: "From One Gardener to Another," being lines to a grandmother on her birthday:

After a long day's work in your garden,
  Sleep and dreams are sweet;
But sweeter far than sleep it is,
  To be among the flowers and fruits
Your busy hands have wrought,
  And better far than dreams, it is
To see the garden widening;
  Transplanted and renewed by you,
New blossoms made familiar,
  Familiar ones made new.

ELSA DEWAR COOK.

E. B. P., Thomaston, Conn. "Slumming" and "slum work" are different things. The first calls for inquisitiveness and an expenditure of time in poking one's nose into the business of other folks who may endure you, especially if you come well laden with cash and dole out gifts to ease your conscience of your prying. "Slum work," on the other hand, requires a great heart, a firm faith, enduring patience, and the ability to teach children and to give helpful advice to adults. Special training is not absolutely necessary, if the person has had experience in teaching, or is willing to learn while doing it. There are a number of settlements which require workers only to have a good average education, and will set them at lesser tasks while they are training for the more difficult. A person who would help to transform a slum into a desirable place must be ready to fight the drink evil, and to show a Christian example in kindness and consideration, so that it will turn the soil of hard hearts.

Miss C. M. E., S. Plymouth, N. Y. The Bible condemns worldly frivolity, folly and wickedness in every form. There are various points of Christian behavior applicable to modern life for which no specific rule or authority can be found in the Bible. Social conditions have greatly changed with the passing centuries. Had promiscuous dancing, as it exists in society today, been prevalent in Bible times (instead of the comparatively innocent amusements then known and the ceremonial or religious dances), it would unquestionably have been a subject of denunciation as sweeping as that applied to any of the vices of that time.

M. W., Salem, Ore. The law of love declared by our Lord (Matt. 5 : 44) admits of no distinction between letter and spirit. The law of love is declared valid toward all men, even personal enemies. By his very hatred our enemy becomes our neighbor; his hatred tempts to retaliation, leaving us no choice but to fall or else defend ourselves with the weapon of love, i. e., to meet persecution with prayer and love.

E. P., Auburn, Ind. Luke 16 : 18 has no reference only to the innocent party.

W. P. A., Seward, Okla. St. Paul, according to traditions preserved by the early Church, was beheaded at Rome, under Nero.

A. H. M., Ray, N. D. There is but one Holy Spirit mentioned in the Bible, namely, the third Person in the Godhead. This same Spirit performed the divine work of creation (Gen. 1 : 2, Ps. 33 : 6). When the Spirit descended on Christ at the baptism (Matt. 3 : 16; John 1 : 32) it was the sign that in Jesus were fulfilled the prophecies of the Old Testament with regard to the outpouring of the Spirit in the Messianic age. This same Spirit is promised to believers. In John 7 : 39, Christ spoke concerning the Spirit which they that believed in him were to receive. The words are a promise. Only when Jesus was glorified —that is, only when he had died, had risen, had ascended on high and had been invested with the glory which was his own, at the right hand of the Father, would man receive that spiritual power which is the condition of all spiritual life.

How an $18 deal on a heifer grew into a great nation-wide business

Fifty years ago there lived on Cape Cod a young man whose sole capital was $18 and an abundance of energy.

His money he invested in a heifer—his energy in dressing the heifer and selling the meat to hungry Cape Codders.

The young man was Gustavus F. Swift, and out of his $18 deal eventually grew a great nation-wide organization.

It is an organization built up gradually from its modest $18 beginning by putting cash into the business, and by saving and reinvesting each year a part of the profits, which amount to only a fraction of a cent per pound.

The shareholders have been content with reasonable dividends, and have been willing to allow the remainder of the profits to be used to expand the business and the service, as the country has grown.

The fractions of cents that have been saved from annual profits have helped to build new packing plants as the demand for meat grew—fractions of cents have financed new branch houses to supply vital needs of distribution—fractions of cents have built refrigerator cars to make fresh meat regularly available everywhere.

It is difficult to imagine any other method of building up a vital business which would involve so little hardship to the people of the country.

If Swift & Company were to eliminate its entire earnings—these fractions of cents that have built packing plants, branch houses and refrigerator cars—the price of meat would be practically unaffected.

The Coming Church and What It Ought to Be

WHILE we are discussing the "Church After the War" and the "Community Church" ideas, let's not get too deep into the situation without feeling our way. The "new" Church should be just what the "old" Church used to be and ought to have continued to be—a center of religious and social activity and usefulness. The old Church was that center and the latter one lost much of its power and influence because it ceased to live up to its privileges and mission. The Church ought to have been the first to extend aid in sickness, relieve distress, and provide for the dependent, but through neglect, lodges and societies were born to perform these various duties. The Church ought to have been in the community what the Maypole is at the May Day fête—a gathering-place where every member catches a line and circles out to the limit, all making their moral and religious influence felt. Now, the "new" Church should commence to correct these neglects, and why should not the returning soldiers be given a large measure of freedom in doing these several things? Why not say to the soldiers, "You have seen real need, real distress and sufferings; real destitution and misery; you must know better how to go about it to give relief and encouragement; go ahead and we will go with you. Ourselves and our substance are consecrated to the Lord's service and work."

Then about the "community church," don't let's get the idea that four chu societies are going to merge and all Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists Episcopalians. You wouldn't expec family each of Smiths, Browns, Jone and Andersons to join hearts and hon and be all Smiths. Neither would y expect that because the Browns w used to having oatmeal for breakf every morning everybody in this n household would be satisfied with o meal. If each church remains org ized as before, uniting with the oth into one larger body, maintaining big united force for service, then "community church" ought to s ceed; but I cannot imagine three ganizations resigning their religio training and preferences to the four in Jonestown, because their own chur has swallowed up everything in Smit ville. If each organization can be pe mitted to maintain its own missiona society, control its own benevolenc hold its own covenant meetings, lo feasts, guilds, aids and endeavor s cieties, not in conflict with the regu united Sunday and weekday servi (the people might in time find som thing in the new to take the place these), then I believe the "commun church" has a place. But the "chur at Andersonville" cannot be all Ep copal, any more than the "church Browntown" can be all Baptist, meet the needs of the community.

What Philip Made for His Sister

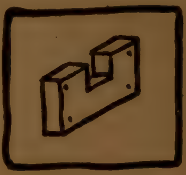
By Laura A. Kirkman

ONE day Philip heard Ethel, his older sister, say that her best dresses always got crushed because they hung against the flat wall of her clothes closet.

"She ought to have a wooden bar running across the center of the closet," Philip said to himself; "then she could hang her dresses on that, by hooking the wire dress hangers on it."

So Philip went ahead and made this improvement. He did it in this manner:

He sawed two pieces of one-inch-thick board to measure four inches in length and two inches in height. In center of these oblong blocks he sa out a cube one inch square (see d gram), and nailed one of these cubes either side of the closet, shoulder hi



Philip then found an old bro handle which he cut d to fit into the closet s ly, stretching from side of it to the oth After painting this pole had only to slip it into wooden supports to co plete the work.

This pole gave Et so much more space in closet that Philip's mot asked him to put one in her clothes closet.

Have You Got Your Garden Book?

Get Your Garden Growing While the Growing's Good!

IF YOU are one of the millions who raised gardens last year, you don't need this advice. Experience has taught you that this is the time to start your garden.

BUT—whether you are a confirmed back-yard gardener, with a fierce enmity for potato bugs and a cultivated taste in early radishes, or one of those who have merely looked on and envied in former years but are determined to get into the game this year—NOW is the time to get your OFFICIAL ILLUSTRATED GOVERNMENT GARDEN BOOK.

There are several different kinds, adapted to different parts of the country. We will send you the one that exactly fills your needs. Address the Christian Herald Information Bureau, Frederic J. Haskin, Director, Washington, D. C. Enclose a two-cent stamp for return postage. Say Garden Book, and WRITE YOUR NAME AND ADDRESS PLAINLY.

A Gray Jaspé Floor

IF your hall needs a new floor, make it Armstrong's Linoleum, laying it over the old wood surface, as was done in this hall.

This linoleum is a gray Jaspé (moiré). It makes a splendid base for fabric rugs. An expert was sent from the store to lay it. He made sure that the wood was thoroughly dry. He planed the surface where it was rough, and filled the cracks. He cemented the linoleum down firmly over a layer of heavy felt paper. He rubbed a good floor wax thoroughly into the linoleum. As the result of proper laying and care, it will be easy to keep this floor in first-class condition. It is a real floor, an economical floor, a permanent floor.

The long-established European custom of linoleum for every room in the house is steadily gaining ground in America. Visit your linoleum merchant and ask him to show you the Armstrong designs suitable for almost any scheme of interior decoration. But in whatever room you put linoleum, have the merchant's expert lay it properly for you.

Linoleum is made of powdered cork, wood flour and oxidized linseed oil, pressed on burlap. Genuine linoleum always has a burlap back, is flexible and not easy to tear. Be sure that you get it. Better still, ask for Armstrong's Linoleum by name. The name, "Armstrong's Linoleum," with the circle A trade mark, appears on the back of all genuine goods. There is a difference.

Armstrong Bureau of Interior Decoration

This Bureau is in charge of a thoroughly trained decorator, who is prepared to give personal suggestions about the selection of Armstrong's Linoleum to suit any scheme of interior decoration. There is no fee for its service. All inquiries will receive courteous attention. Address Bureau of Interior Decoration.

Aluminum Cooking Utensils

LIKE many other transports and battleships of the U. S. Navy, the "George Washington" is equipped with aluminum cooking utensils consisting of giant steam-jacketed kettles, coffee urns, stock pots and carriers used for conveying food from the kitchens to the feeding stations.

Aboard the "George Washington" there are 23 steam-jacketed kettles, 13 coffee urns, 150 stock pots and 125 food carriers. This equipment is made of the same material and in the same way as the "Wear-Ever" aluminum utensils that are serving in so many thousands of American homes.

We are proud of the war-record of "Wear-Ever"—proud of the demonstration it has given on ship and battlefield, in hospital and cantonment, of its ability to withstand the hardest kind of usage.

This "Wear-Ever" demonstration of durability emphasizes what so many women already know:—that, on the basis of years of service, "Wear-Ever" utensils are the most economical utensils possible to buy.

We also wish to express our appreciation to those women who, although desiring to add to their "Wear-Ever" sets during the war, were patient when they found it impossible to get the "Wear-Ever" utensils they wanted because of incomplete dealer-stocks as a result of the demands made on "Wear-Ever" by the national service.

We are glad to announce, however, that we now have resumed manufacturing a complete line of "Wear-Ever" utensils in quantities sufficient, we hope, to meet the nation-wide demand for these most durable utensils that are like silver in their shining beauty.

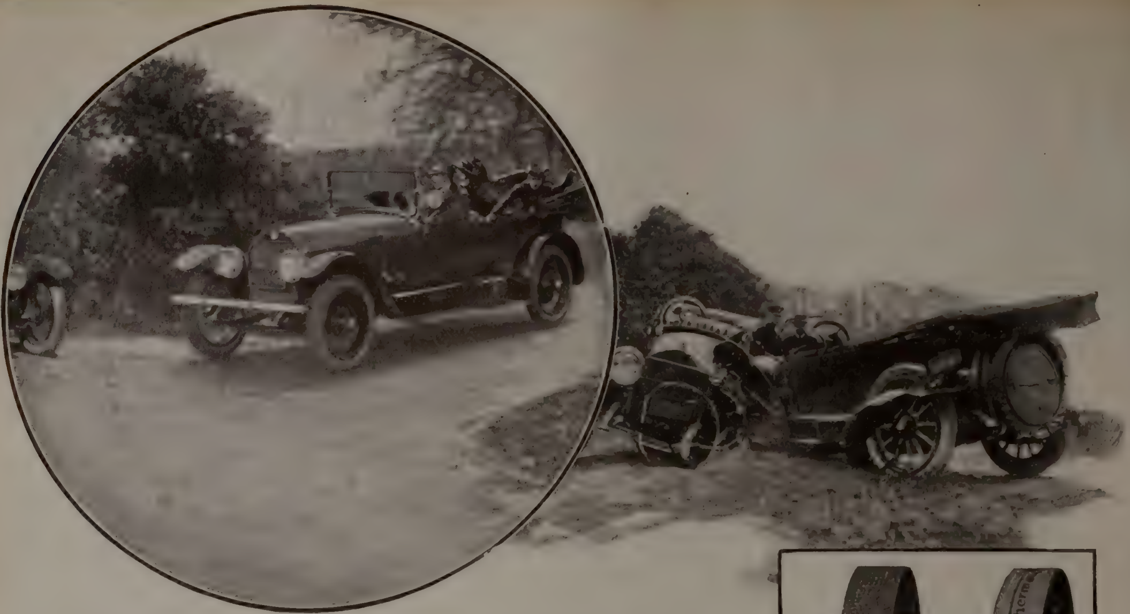
ONE would hardly guess that a story starting out with a young Korean's cracking his child wife's head with a laundering iron, and then taking to the wilderness, would swiftly develop into one of the most powerful impulses for foreign missions ever written; but such is "Chansung's Confession," which is being prepared for early publication.



One car in every ten smashed each year

Faulty brakes cause damage and loss of life

OFFICIAL statistics show that 10 per cent of all cars meet with accidents every year.

Some person is killed or injured in four out of five of these accidents.

Records kept by State officials further show that 10 per cent of all automobile accidents could be absolutely prevented if the brakes had been efficient and properly handled.

Make sure of the brakes on your car

It is so easy to assume that your brakes are efficient. They are out of sight, and you seldom think of them until you really need them.

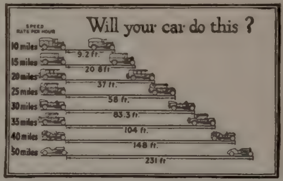
You wouldn't ride in an elevator if you knew that it hadn't been inspected. The State has relieved you of the necessity of finding this out for yourself, for the State inspects all elevators and sees to it, so far as careful inspection can, that elevator riding is safe.

Make sure that your automobile is safe for riding. Have your garage man inspect the brakes. When the big emergency comes, you can feel certain that they will not fail. Brake inspection does not necessarily mean new brake lining.

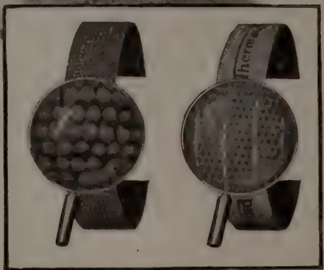
In many cases a simple tightening of the brake rods, or an adjustment of the equalizer, will make your brakes a means of protection instead of a menace to the safety of yourself and others. Your garage man will tell you if new brake lining is needed.

Why Thermoid brake lining is safest and wears longest

In each square inch of Thermoid brake lining there is 40% more material than in ordinary woven lining. This additional body gives a closer texture which is made tight and compact by hydraulic compression under 2000 lbs. pressure. In addition to this, Thermoid is Grapnalized, an exclusive process in manufacture which enables it to resist moisture, oil and gasoline.



This chart shows the distance in which a car should stop, at any given speed, if brakes are efficient.



Ordinary woven lining
Notice the loosely woven texture
Wears down quickly and unevenly, losing its gripping power as it wears

Thermoid Hydraulic Compressed Brake Lining
Notice the compact texture
Wears down slowly
Gives uniform gripping surface until wafer thin

The close, compact texture of Thermoid, made by this method, causes it to wear down more slowly than ordinary brake lining, and so evenly that it maintains its gripping power even when worn to wafer thinness.

The engineers and manufacturers of 50 of the leading passenger cars and trucks have standardized on Thermoid Hydraulic Compressed Brake Lining because it makes their cars safer.

Have your brakes inspected today. Remember that every foot of Thermoid is backed by Our Guarantee: Thermoid will make good—or WE WILL

BOLSHEVISM ON THE MARCH

Spirit of Political and Social Unrest Fast Spreading Throughout Central Europe and Overthrowing Governments

By R. D. HENKLE

WHEREVER there is social unrest—and there seems to be no civilized state where this unrest has not appeared in the wake of the war—there the Bolshevist pleader is spreading his specious arguments.

History has no other political movement which has so quickly leveled national boundaries, disturbed the established order and overthrown so many of the ideals on which human society is constructed. The big fact is that it grew, and continues to grow, with increasing rapidity.

On June 1, 1918, the Bolsheviki controlled approximately two-fifths of European Russia. On April 1, 1919, they controlled about four-fifths. They won this vast territory by terrorism, well supported by superior genius for military command and an effective, hard-fighting army which had grown to number between 800,000 and 1,000,000 men.

Russia did not want to be brave. She was hungry and cold. She wanted food and fuel and clothes for her women and children and her ill and aged, more than she wanted liberty for people she had never seen and in whom she had no interest. Kerensky could not give these to her, but Bolshevism promised them. More than that, it promised universal peace; a brotherhood of man; a communist state in which wealth and all the sources of wealth should belong to the proletariat.

So Russia turned Bolshevist!

It is now some seventeen months since it emerged as a political force from its birthplace in Smolny Institute, Petrograd, and trod its red way along the Nevsky Prospect in protest against Kerensky's plea for Russia to be brave-hearted and suffer just a little more in the cause of her own and the world's freedom.

With that beginning, a movement of tremendous power has spread its tentacles into every corner of the world. It has absorbed Hungary and Bavaria. It has fastened itself on Austria and Germany. It is reaching for Italy, Rumania, Poland, Belgium and Czechoslovakia and it is boldly showing its head in England and France.

In Smolny Institute, buttressed behind rifles and machine guns on the day of Kerensky's fall, was a small group of men who had hastened back to Russia from exile on the astonishing news of the collapse of the old Czarist régime. Three-fourths of them had returned from their asylum in the United States, where they had been making precarious livings in sweatshops, steel mills or packing plants, and devoting their nights to the preaching of revolutionary doctrines. They were theorists, idealists; certainly they were not equipped temperamentally or practically for their self-imposed task of bringing order out of the chaos of Russia and prosperity to the impoverished. But they never hesitated. A nation of 180,000,000 people was prostrate before them for a tremendous experiment in human vivisection, and in the course of the operation they intended to discover the seat of the ills of the workingman of the country and apply their remedy.

The operation did not kill Russia. Neither did the remedy cure its economic ills.

"We can do nothing with this one nation," said Lenine, the chief surgeon. "Russia is infected from without. Before we can cure her we shall have to cure the world. Our specific will accomplish this once we set it to working."

THE ranks of the Bolsheviki held many capable and zealous missionaries who could be trusted to carry the Lenine message into other countries. The most fertile field for propaganda was the Central European states, which found their old governmental systems collapsing as a result of the war. The people were confused and alarmed at finding themselves free from the accustomed monarchical control and forced to choose a new form of government for themselves The economic pressure exerted by the Allies, lack of sufficient food, the absence of raw material with which factories could resume operation, the uncertainty of the future and the intention of the Allied powers to construct new states and reestablish boundaries, brought about an unsettled condition in which it was recognized any thing might happen.

The first agent who made his presence felt in the Central States was Karl Radek. He appeared in Berlin early in November and got in touch with Dr. Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg. He financed the early Spartacan disorders, which were directed toward the overthrow of the Ebert government, and very soon imported from Russia a very able group of confederates who took up and carried on his work when Liebknecht and Frau Luxemburg were killed and he was driven from the country. These agents have been working in close cooperation with Lenine and Trotzky, and there seem grounds for belief that they will succeed in displacing the government established by authority of the Weimar assembly.

When Radek went to Berlin, Bela Kun made his way into Budapest. Kun had been for some time Lenine's private secretary, and he had taken an important part in the development of Bolshevism in Russia. As special ambassador from his chief, he found a very cordial welcome waiting him from the Hungarian radicals. He went about his task of winning Hungary less spectacularly than Radek in Germany, however. He depended on organization rather than on open rebellion, and he succeeded where Radek failed. Quietly and unostentatiously he laid the groundwork for his coup. On March 22 the government of the provisional president of Hungary, Count Michael Karolyi, quietly turned over the direction of affairs to Kun as foreign minister of the new Soviet republic.

"The proletariat of Hungary, from today, has taken all power into its own hands. . . . The council decrees the socialization of large estates, mines, big industries, banks and transport lines, declares complete solidarity with the Russian Soviet government, and offers to contract an armed alliance with the proletariat of Russia. . . . Uniting with the world's Bolsheviki, we rise against the Entente and imperialism."

IN THESE sentences, contained in a series of proclamations issued in Budapest on that day, there is the first concrete evidence that Soviet Russia had reached beyond the bounds of the old empire and had taken the first step toward the goal of its ambition—a Communist League of Nations.

Kun immediately got in touch with the communists of Vienna and set in motion there the machinery for the establishment of Soviet rule in German-Austria. Conditions in Austria undeniably are favorable to him, and there is every reason to believe the Austrians will be ready to espouse the cause when Germany sees fit to act. The declaration of a communist government in Bavaria, announced on April 4, may, in fact, force the Austrians into line even before the Germans take action.

The Bavarian proclamation is due almost entirely to the influence of Kun. While the Munich government, from the time the Wittelsbach dynasty was deposed, was the most radical in Germany, and under the direction of Kurt Eisner was virtually communist, there was sufficient influence in the state to keep Bavaria in line with the German confederation and to have her represented in the Weimar assembly. With the assassination of Eisner, however, the more radical elements increased their hold on the government and severed more and more of the ties that bound their state to Berlin and Weimar. Then, on April 2, Kun appeared from Budapest. There were protracted meetings of all the extreme socialistic factions, which culminated in the declaration of communism on the 4th. [A Bavarian Soviet Republic was proclaimed in Munich on April 7. The Socialist Government was transferred to Nuremberg.]

Both in Hungary and Bavaria, the Bolshevists show they have profited by the most glaring mistakes made by Trotzky and Lenine. There has been no deviation from the principle of a dictatorship of the proletariat, but there has been an obvious intention to avoid as much as possible a complete revolution in the economic system. All public and quasi-public institutions have been nationalized, and minimum wages for three separate classes of workers have been established, but there has been no complete confiscation of private property. Estates up to the value of approximately $5,000 have been left in the possession of the owners.

RUMANIA, Poland and Italy, after the Germanic states, show the greatest evidence of Bolshevist influence. Radical socialism has been a strong force in Italy for several years, and during the war it seriously compromised the government on more than one occasion. The delay in demobilization of the army, and industrial stagnation, have brought much strength to it in recent months, although there is no indication at present that it will be able to climb into the saddle.

Poland and Rumania, on the other hand, are thoroughly impregnated with Bolshevism. Lenine has spent several million dollars in Poland spreading his propaganda, and reliable correspondents estimate that between two and three thousand paid and volunteer agents are active in the new republic. While Premier Paderewski seems to have the situation well in hand now, conditions are such that even a day might bring a complete reversal.

Rumania, on the border line of Soviet Russia, has been particularly susceptible to propaganda, due to the economic and moral collapse of the country which resulted from the German occupation. The royal government has tried to adapt itself to the changed conditions by liberalizing the land laws and otherwise improving the status of the peasants. Aside from Russia, Rumania was the medieval country in Europe in its treatment of the peasant class, and the government laid up against itself a very deep-seated resentment which Bolshevism has been quick to capitalize for its own ends. At this time the only monarchy left in middle and eastern Europe, with the exception of the new Jugoslav kingdom, the future of the state is uncertain, to say the least.

Little has been heard from Bulgaria in recent weeks. But as early as the middle of January a modified type of communism was introduced by that government. Hungarian Bolshevists have appeared in Sofia, however, and they are working for the establishment of a pure Soviet government, with what seems to be some chance of success, although the Bulgarian, by nature, is more conservative than the other eastern European peoples.

In Belgium and Czechoslovakia the workingmen are in a receptive mood. They have not embraced Bolshevism, but the least that can be said is that they are considering it.

In France there is a well-defined drift among the big socialist population toward active communism, but its future development depends a great deal on the coming budget and the consequent readjustment of the tax schedule.

British Bolshevists, just now, are devoting their energies to the nationalization of transport lines, public utilities and mines, and working to this end in more or less cooperation with the Labor Party. The trend of Bolshevism, however, is very plainly evident in the more radical elements of the party.

PEACE PROMISED BY EASTER

THE sessions of the inner Council of the Peace Conference while not bulletined nor reported were manifestly making progress on April 7. Various related matters such as indemnity and territorial adjustments were being brought to a conclusion, and the subordinate commissions which were working out the details were putting on all possible despatch. President Wilson was kept in bed by a severe cold from April 3 to 7, his place in the council being taken by Colonel House. The preliminary agreement was expected to be ready by April 9, and the completed treaty was confidently predicted before Easter. It was expected that the German delegates would be given time to lay the treaty before the National Assembly at Weimar and that the final signing would take place early in May. As a possible confirmation of this promise Paris cabled, the report not being confirmed here, that the President had ordered the transport George Washington, at Hoboken undergoing repainting and overhauling, to proceed at once to Europe. The various elements of the peace making as they have appeared in the news are as follows:

BELGIUM. King Albert of Belgium appeared before the Inner Council on April 3 and 4 to present Belgium's case and to secure immediate help. He asked for an immediate loan of 10,000,000,000 francs to redeem German marks deposited in Belgian banks after the liberation of that country. He also asked for early exportation to Belgium from England and the United States of raw material, and for the session to Belgium of the left bank of the Scheldt River and of the Limburg peninsula of Holland.

INDEMNITY. Following the visit of King Albert to the "Big 4" it was announced that Belgium would receive on account of her total claims 2,500,000,000 francs, out of the first indemnity collected from Germany. Although previously announced as having been set at $30,000,000,000, reports from the Peace Conference, on April 4, indicated that the amount Germany must pay had been fixed at $50,000,000,000, the first payment to be $5,000,000,000 cash, and the rest in payments running from 25 to 35 years.

DANZIG. Marshal Foch and Mathias Erzberger met at Spa, on April 3, to consider the controversy over the landing of Polish troops at Danzig. It was arranged that the Polish troops should proceed by rail through Germany, the Allies reserving the right to use Danzig if necessary. Premier Paderewski, who arrived in Paris on April 7, said Danzig was vital to Poland.

FIUME. M. Trumbitch, Serbian Minister of Foreign Affairs, presented the Jugoslav claims in the Adriatic before the Council of four in Paris on April 3. Premier Orlando withdrew. The correspondents declared that there was an impression in Paris that the claims of the Jugoslav nation would be recognized. Italy was also reported as inflexible in her determination to adhere to her demands.

JAPAN. Baron Makino, head of the Japanese delegation to the Peace Conference, said on April 2, "We are not too proud to fight, we are too proud to accept a place of inferiority in dealing with one or more associated nations. We want nothing but simple justice." This was in explanation of Japan's desire to have written into the League of Nations covenant a provision forbidding racial discrimination.

HUNGARY. The Peace Conference, on April 2, sent General Smuts to Budapest to investigate the Hungarian situation, revoking the plan to organize a military expedition under General Mangin.

SOUTH AFRICA. A delegation of South African Dutchmen, representing the National Free Party of the Cape Colony, Orange Free State, Transvaal and Natal, reached New York on April 1 en route to Paris to plead at the Peace Conference for self-determination for the Dutch portion of the British Union of South Africa.

BLOCKADE. The Allied blockade of Poland, Esthonia, German-Austria, Turkey, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia and the territories occupied by Rumania and Serbia was lifted on April 1, on all articles, except those of a military nature going to Austria.

AUSTRALIA. Australia asked at the Peace Conference control of the German colonies in the Pacific as partial reimbursement from Germany for the cost of the war and the fiscal freedom of the commonwealth of Australia.

LABOR. The conference of Representatives of Labor meeting in connection with the Peace Conference completed its work on March 31. It proposed international regulation of labor conditions, and international exchange of labor information.

SPAIN. It was reported, on April 2, that the Spanish delegates to the Peace Conference had announced the intention of their government to seek authority of the Cortes to join the League of Nations.

The Week in the World's News

THE VICTORY LOAN. Secretary of the Treasury Glass, on April 1, declared that the nation's finances were sound and that business conditions assured a period of prosperity which would soon send Liberty Bonds above par. The Secretary said that the national debt was less than $25,000,000,000, and that when all war debts were met it would not exceed $30,000,000,000, and that America would hold obligations of foreign countries totaling $10,000,000,000. He anticipated an early return of all national expenditures to a total of not more than $2,000,000,000 a year. According to the Secretary American bank deposits have increased in the last four years $5,000,000,000, and the wealth of the country has reached a total of $235,000,000,000.

Five surrendered German submarines will tour American ports to boost the Victory Loan, and a large number of the enemy's guns will be distributed throughout the country as part of the manifestation of victory. The 302d tank corps reached New York on April 2, with 34 Renault and 10 American tanks, which had seen service in the Argonne and at St. Mihiel, which were to be used to help carry the Victory Loan "Over the Top."

The Victory Loan drive was put under way two weeks before the opening date in New York City. On April 6, workers representing groups of naturalized Americans of many races at a great meeting in the Hippodrome, received gold starred flags in memory of the sons, given to America's cause, and pledged the sale to their people of over $430,000,000 of the new bonds.

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASES. On April 1 the Federal Employment Service reported a surplus of labor in 36 states, a shortage of labor in 7, and neither shortage nor surplus in 17. The total increase of unemployment during the last week in March was given as 2,000.

PROHIBITION LOSS. Internal Revenue Commissioner Roper, on April 1, estimated that the loss in revenue through the elimination of beverages containing alcohol could be largely made up through the tax on alcohol in industrial use. During the year 1917–18 $450,000,000 of revenue was realized from beer, wine and whisky taxes and $200,000,000 from taxes on industrial alcohol. Grain alcohol is used industrially in the manufacture of paints, bronzes, chemicals, pharmaceuticals, perfumes, soaps, essential oils, flavoring extracts, and in the production of silk, fine hats, artificial leather, dyes, explosives, rubber, and all solvents, and in many other manufacturing processes. It is expected that an increase in the use of alcohol in the arts and manufactures will speedily replace a large part of the income now apparently to be lost through the elimination of booze.

GOVERNMENT RELEASES PACKERS. The meat packing industry, which had been under Federal license since October, 1917, was released from the Food Administration's control on April 1. The stockyards were kept under Government control. While under Government control the packers had been limited to a profit of 9 per cent., but prevailing prices prevented the realization of the permitted profit.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE. A delegation of 40 prominent Filipinos, headed by Manuel Quezon, President of the Philippine Senate, presented a memorial, on April 4, to Secretary of War Baker, pleading for the recognition of the independence of the Philippines in accordance with America's promise that independence would follow the establishment of a stable government. The memorial stated that independence is the great national ideal of the people of the Philippine country, and while recognizing that America had treated them "as no one ever before has treated another people under its sway," it continued, "and yet you—and none better than you —will understand why under such conditions our people still crave independence, that they too may be sovereign masters of their own destinies." Secretary Baker, expressing his own sympathy with the aspirations of the Philippine people, read to the delegation a letter from President Wilson in which the President declared that he shared the sentiments of the delegation, and that "the people of the United States have with reason taken the deepest pride in the loyalty and support of the Philippine people." The question of Philippine independence will come before the 66th Congress.

TALKING MONEY. Representative Goode of Indiana, who will be Chairman of the Appropriations Committee in the House of Representatives of the 66th Congress, made public, on April 3, a list of the appropriations of the 65th Congress, and an estimate of the probable appropriations of the 66th. He estimated that the new Congress would have to appropriate in the neighborhood of $4,000,000,000. Th total appropriations of the 64th and 65th Congresse for the War Emergency were $53,569,181,776.30, o which it was possible to repeal because of the armistice $6,458,246,515.51, making the net appropriatio for the War Emergency and the operation of th government through that time $47,110,935,160.79 To cover this $16,657,823,503.40 was expected to b available from various sources of income, and ther had been raised by the sales of bonds and War Savings Stamps an additional amount sufficient to bring the income to $42,546,777,769.92. The differenc Representative Goode said would have to be raised by bond sales.

BRITAIN'S NEW ARMY. The House of Common on March 31, passed a military bill providing for new army of 859,000 to be maintained to the end o the present emergency. On March 31 Great Britai had at home 176,000 troops, in France 120,000, o the Rhine 264,000. In Italy and adjacent region 10,000, with small forces in many other localitie throughout the world.

REVOLT IN ABYSSINIA. Dispatches of April 2 from Abyssinia reported a revolt, headed by the grandson of King Johannes II, who died in 1889. The pretende had taken the name of Theodore. The Governmen of the Empress Lidj Jeassu, daughter of Menelik, wa sending forces to put down the revolt.

REVOLUTION IN MEXICO. General Aurelio Blanquet was reported on April 4 to have landed in Mexico to take command of 40,000 revolutionary troops, followers of Felix Diaz. The Diaz forces were said to be scattered through 15 of the 27 Mexican states, the majority being in the state of Vera Cruz. The movement was declared to be intended to restore the Mexican constitution of 1857. Carranza announced that he was prepared to nip the revolution in the bud.

DEBS MUST SERVE SENTENCE. The Supreme Court, on March 31, refused Eugene V. Debs' application for a rehearing of his case. Debs declared that on May 1, the day when he would begin his sentence, there would be a general strike headed by the miners of Indiana, his home state. The President was asked to exercise clemency.

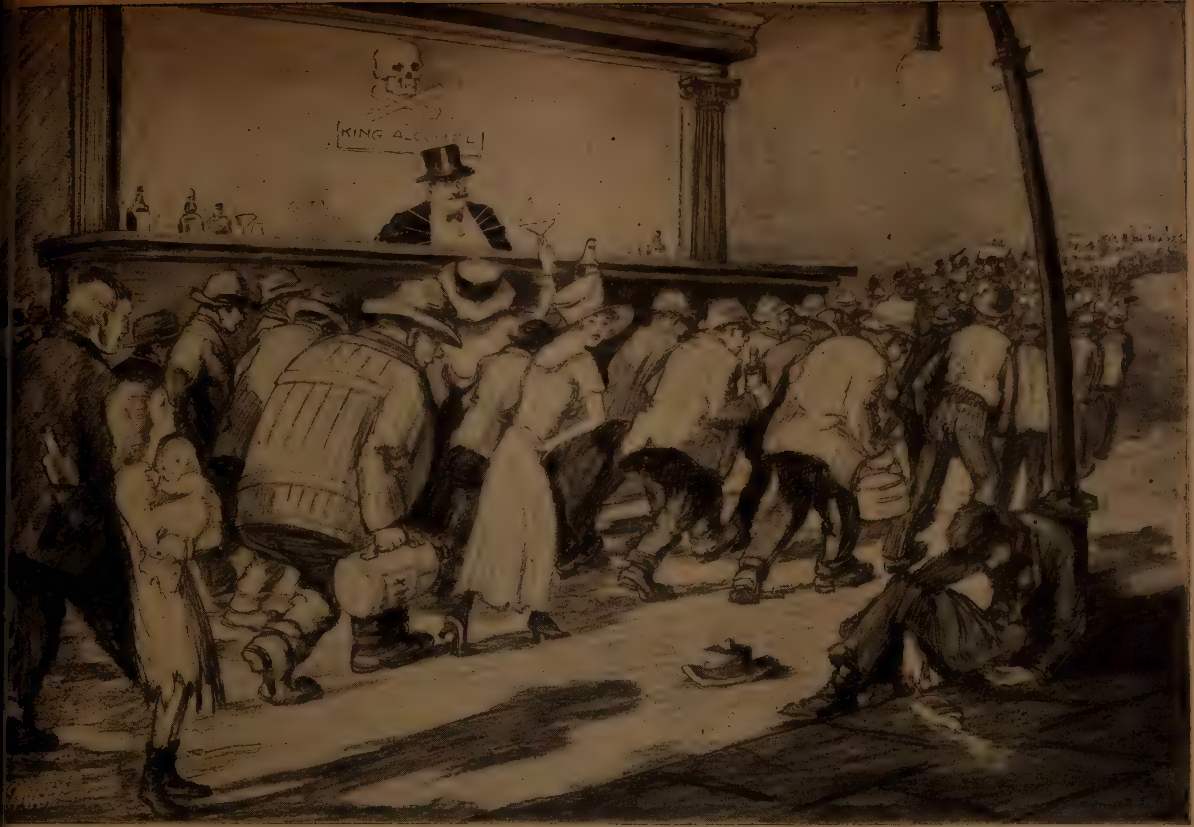
$200,000,000 IN A DAY. The War Finance Corporation, on April 2, offered $200,000,000, of 5 per cent. one-year bonds. The whole issue was oversubscribed on the first day.

SUFFRAGE ABROAD. In the French Chamber of Deputies, on April 3, the Electoral Reform Bill was under discussion. An amendment providing that members of the Chamber of Deputies should be elected without distinction of sex was defeated as was an amendment providing that the right to vote should be transmitted to the next relative of the heads of families without distinction of sex. In the British Commons, however, on the same day, the House passed on its second reading a bill to permit women to sit and vote in the House of Lords and otherwise removing inequalities between the sexes still remaining in the laws.

LABOR SOLUTION IN BRITAIN. As a result of the industrial conference between representatives of employers of trade unions, which had been meeting for some weeks in London, it was said on April 5 that an adjustment had been reached on the outstanding differences. It was said that the final solution would be worked out gradually as a result of the cooperation of all classes having as their object not self-interest but the creation of a better country for all to live in. The report of the special committee of ten recommended a universal 48-hour week with a scale of minimum wages, the legal recognition of trade unions and of organizations of employers, and the application to all workers and employers of wages and hours recognized and agreed on by the Trade Unions, and their employers, the prevention of unemployment and the maintenance of the unemployed, old age pensions and the creation of a permanent national industrial council of representatives of employers and employees. The Lloyd George government is expected to take steps toward legal enactment of those recommendations.

EIGHT HOURS IN ITALY. Labor and capital in Italy have entered into a "partnership agreement" by which the hours of labor will be reduced from twelve a day to eight with no loss of pay.

SIMS COMES HOME. Admiral W. S. Sims, who commanded the American fleet which made its base in the British Isles during the war, returned home on April 7, on the Mauretania, landing in New York. His family went down the bay in a patrol boat to greet him, and the Atlantic Fleet sent destroyers to welcome him.



A PASSING KING'S LAST GRAND REVIEW OF HIS SUBJECTS

National Association Opposed to Prohibition had announced that "Liberty Parades" would be held in all cities on April 19, as a popular demonstration st prohibition. Later announcement is made that the demonstration has been postponed. Perhaps the liquor interests have realized the wisdom of ld Kentucky colonel, a distiller, who, when asked if the saloon men would have a parade in protest against the temperance movement, said: "No, no. If the public ever saw you fellows together in a bunch that would be the end of it."

Prohibition Empties the Jails

BRANDEN, Manitoba, two out of three jails were closed in 1918 for lack of inmates, arrests for drunkenness having been reduced in 1918 to fifteen for the year, as against 320 in 1915, while twenty-eight persons were committed to jail for uses in the year.

e Brown County jail in Indiana was empty in uary, the last prisoner having been his own jailer, g himself out each morning for the day's work, ocking himself in at night. This jail was built 37 and has rendered long and efficient service, rohibition has no respect for age or traditions.

lone, N. Y., 7,500 people, after five months of bition, had only five inmates in its jail, as against mal population in wet days of forty to fifty-five. sheriff had rooms to let, and the meat bill had ped from $100 a month to $21. Also the Grand couldn't keep busy a week, and the spring term urt was over almost before it began. Judges and nen are certainly entitled to consideration.

tte, Mont., where the Wild West was never d until prohibition triumphed in the state, had single murder in the first month of prohibition, only 375 arrests, compared with 881 in the wet h preceding, while Lewiston, Mont., sat discone around an empty county jail.

1914 Oregon sent 257 prisoners to her state peniary; in 1918, under prohibition, only 94.

ter a year of prohibition the Detroit infirmary population had dwindled from 1,325 to 625, while the numof families furnished with provisions by the city ped from 6,074 to 4,750. All crime decreased in oit in 1918 under prohibition, assaults decreased 65 ent., burglaries 56 per cent., embezzlements 29 per , larcenies 44 per cent., murders dropped from 10, or 71 per cent., robberies from 320 to 49, or er cent., begging 94 per cent., prostitution 61 per , disorderly conduct 96 per cent., disturbing the e 63 per cent. Gambling decreased 66 per cent., support of families 35 per cent., and vagrancies er cent ; while traction and industrial accidents eased similarly. At this rate Detroit will not need her commodious jail; a cottage will do.

The workhouse of Marion County, Indiana, the county including Indianapolis, the capital city, was closed June 1, 1918, after three months of prohibition. Thirty-four county jails in Indiana were empty in September, 1918, while eight others held only persons committed for insanity. And the jail commitments over the whole state were only 55 per cent. of those of the corresponding wet period.

In Concord, N. H., the superintendent of the county houses of correction complained that since the state went dry he had so few men consigned to the workhouse that he had to employ outside help to care for the workhouse farms. In the liquid days he hated to forget, he had had men to hire out for highway and public construction work.

In South Dakota prohibition in ten months so pacified the turbulent mining country of Lawrence County that the county jail held only eight inmates, of whom five were Federal prisoners. A short time previously the jail had held but two boarders. In Aberdeen, S. D., arrests dropped from 48 in October, 1916, to 19 in October, 1917.

Dallas, Texas, is a fine town, but it used to escort fifteen cases of tanglefoot a day to the city bastile. Under prohibition arrests for drunkenness dropped to three a day. A brewer would say this proves prohibition doesn't prohibit; but how about the twelve?

In Georgia, according to the Atlanta Banner, prohibition in its first year reduced the misdemeanor arrests nearly 50 per cent.

In the District of Columbia in the first eight months of drought arrests for all causes numbered 2,863, a decrease of 3,908 cases, or 58 per cent., from the record of the corresponding months of the preceding wet year. The workhouse population, although increased somewhat by the picketing activities of militant suffragists, was reduced to a daily average of 313, as compared with 536 when Washington was wet.

Up in Alaska, where jails are at least warm, prohibition has so reduced disorder of every degree that the United States Deputy Marshal was quoted as saying: "I expect to see the jail completely emptied of prisoners in the near future by the dry law."

The Age-Herald of Birmingham, Ala., the city of the empty jail, compiled a table of comparisons between 1913, wet, and 1916, dry The table is interesting and permits but one conclusion. Some of the most important items follow:

Grand total of all arrests: 1913, 21,247; 1916, 15,758. Decrease, 25 per cent.
Grand Jury sessions: 1913, 117 days; 1916, 55 days.
Coroner's cases: 1913, 403; 1916, 269.
Total deaths per thousand: 1913, 2,749; 1916, 2,288.
Bank deposits: 1913, $26,883,000; 1916, $30,129,786.

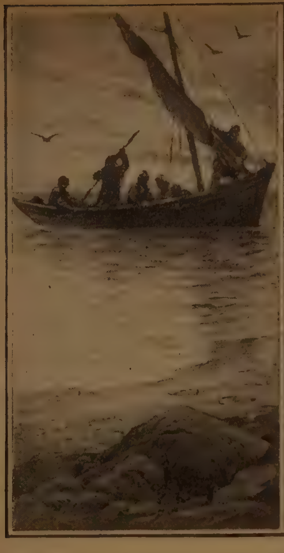
In Idaho in eleven months of prohibition the Children's Home-Finding and Aid Society had no children committed to its charge from Ada County, while in the year preceding prohibition it had received 18.

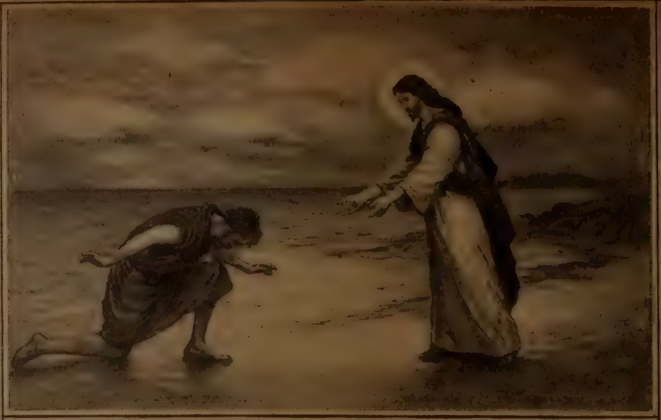
The Oregon State Hospital in the nine months preceding prohibition received 25 men insane from alcohol; in the nine succeeding dry months only 10.

In New England, with 11,885 paupers in almshouses in 1916, 181.4 per thousand of population, prohibition Maine had only 127.3 per thousand, and almost dry Vermont 107.6.

A former saloon man of Pueblo, Colo., after six months of prohibition, said that the tax rate had not increased in spite of a loss of $90,000 to $100,000 a year from saloon licenses; that bank deposits and the number of savings deposits were much larger than when drink was sold; that the city jail saw little doing, and the police force had been reduced by six or eight; and that even the poor were less hopeless than before. He said: "From an economic standpoint I would like to see the entire world without saloons."

Oneonta, N. Y., ventured into the desert in October, 1918, under the local option law. Arrests dropped from 35 to 14 in October, and from 37 to 9 in November. A shoe shop hit upon the alliterative slogan: "Less booze, more shoes." Merchants reported an immediate increase in sales and a better class of merchandise moving. The house-furnishing stores, the home of the dollar down and a dollar a week forever, began to do a cash business by the preference of their customers, and grocers sold food where barkeeps had drawn booze. Oneonta never knew such prosperity.





The Awakening of Peter

An Easter Meditation

By CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "In His Steps," "His Brother's Keeper," "Jesus Is Here," "All the World," etc., etc.

MANY years ago, nearly two thousand in all, in a little province of the great Roman Empire, a most remarkable event occurred, which is of very great importance to us here today.

Listen and I will relate how it has come to pass that this astonishing thing which occurred nearly twenty centuries ago touches the very center of the life of the world in which we now live.

A man by the name of Cæsar was on the throne of the greatest world empire ever ruled by military power. Under his scepter, which was a sword, many peoples and lands were subject. In one of the lands called Judea was a noted city called Jerusalem, and just outside that city one day three men were nailed to crosses. It was a common custom of dealing with criminals, and these men were all criminals in the eyes of the law.

But here is the astonishing feature about this thing that occurred that day, so many years ago, just outside the city of Jerusalem in the province of Judea, this Roman province, over which was a Roman governor.

Two of these men who were nailed to crosses were robbers who made their living by waylaying travelers going into or from Jerusalem, along the road to Jericho, or Bethlehem, or on the road to the south into the desert. And under the custom of the times in which they lived they were perhaps worthy of death.

But the third person was a young man by the name of Jesus, sometimes called Jesus of Nazareth, because he had lived in a town of that name and had been a carpenter there.

Surely this young man was not a criminal. There must have been some mistake in crucifying him between two robbers. For according to the testimony of all who knew him he had never harmed a single human being. He had spent his whole time in doing good. He knew how to heal people of various diseases, and people came to him from all over the countryside to be cured of blindness, of which there was a great deal in that time, and of paralysis and rheumatism and consumption and deafness. Little children loved him and he used to take them up in his arms and bless them. The only people who were afraid of him were hypocrites and men who lived mean and narrow lives. These hated him and finally, through a charge of treason against the Roman government, they prevailed on the governor, a man by the name of Pilate, to give the legal order for his execution.

So that was the reason why this innocent man whom little children loved was put to death. And although he was not very well known outside the province and although Cæsar had perhaps never heard of him unless in a letter from the governor, yet it is true that a great many people were deeply interested in the carrying out of the governor's sentence, and, more remarkable still, what happened two days afterwards had the most important effect on the Roman Empire of any event in its history.

THE people who were interested that day in the execution of this innocent person were of all classes in spite of the fact that Jesus of Nazareth himself was a person without a title and possessed of no property. Listen to this recital of an unparalleled occurrence and the story of the people who were affected by it.

First of all there was a group of men called Pharisees. These were the men who planned and plotted to have Jesus crucified. They were well-to-do people, often connected with the church, and they lived in some of the best houses in Jerusalem and were looked upon generally as respectable citizens. As a matter of fact, they were the most dangerous people in the city, for they were hypocrites, and hypocrites are people who live in a constant atmosphere of falsehood, and falsehood is the enemy of all human progress and happiness, because it perverts and distorts all definitions of right and justice and truth. It is the most terrible of all sins because it leads to all sin, even to that of murder.

This, then, was the first group of men interested in this cross between the two crosses, for they felt sure that they had that day killed the truth out of the world by killing him who had often said that he himself was the incarnate truth.

There was another group deeply interested in this cross between the two crosses. And that was the group of high priests and magistrates and ecclesiastical men in this Roman province. They also, like the scribes and Pharisees, hated and feared Jesus, because he had taught a simple creed and because he had rebuked the ritualism and formalism of the religion these men had been teaching the people. They hated him so much that even while he was hanging on the cross they passed along in front of his tortured body and insulted him, asking him why he did not come down from the cross and save himself if he were indeed the Son of God as he claimed to be.

An individual to whom the cross between the two crosses was of great importance was the Roman governor. He was not a cruel man, as men were counted in those times. But he was worse,—he was a man who knew justice and was too weak and cowardly to exercise it. After the evidence was all in which accused Jesus of treason, Pilate said publicly, "I do not find any thing in all this which finds this man guilty. I find no crime in him." There spoke the Roman sense of justice and Roman law in which the governor had been brought up. But he wanted to be popular, and he did not want to be bothered with a mob of yelling Jews and a riot in Jerusalem. So he said, "Take him yourselves and crucify him. His blood be on you and your children."

Surely the great Roman governor must have slept badly that night, the night after he, backed up by the Roman war machine, allowed an innocent Jewish carpenter to be crucified. God have mercy on all men who know the truth and live a lie!

THERE was a small group of men immediately near the cross between the two crosses who were affected by the event—the Roman soldiers who drove the nails through the quivering flesh and the officer who commanded them.

While the common soldiers were doing what they were in the habit of doing nearly every day, the innocent sufferer, being pressed down by their dirty hands, said, as he smiled up into their faces, "Father, forgive them! They know not what they do!"

Some time shall we possibly know if these men kneeling there over that body, paused with their hammers uplifted, and stared stupidly at one another, not grasping the meaning of those gracious words. But perhaps they and their officer talked it over afterwards, for they said as they drew back from the cross between the two crosses, "Surely this man was the son of God!"

Come, ye ambitious young artists, seeking a new subject to thrill the imagination and rebuk commonplaces of art, paint us the scene at the barracks on the evening of the Crucifixion, centurion and the men who held the hamme the nails, coming up the hill Golgotha and there together in the darkness, the first conv the "power of the cross." It might have been, do we know it was not?

But all the humanity that was affected death of the person on the cross between th crosses was not all brutal or weak or cruel or ins There was a group there that loved him and why. There was his mother, and a young m the name of John, one of his disciples and, at a dis because they could not bear to witness the sigh close at hand, was a group of acquaintances a mothers of other disciples who had cared for wants when he had stopped with his disciples a homes.

These, a tender-hearted group, their souls out at the dreadful sight, all hope of deliverance eyeing the cross between the two crosses with blinded vision and then, unable to look, co their heads with their mantles, let their hearts over the tragedy which had put an end to earthly hopes forever.

BUT among all the persons affected by the cro tween the two crosses, there was one m whom the tragedy meant more than to any o Jerusalem or in all Judea. That one man was the Galilean fisherman. Listen to the story heart as he crouched that day in a little room house at the end of the Via Sacra, with the locked, his shaggy head between his hands, sw his body back and forth in that bitterest emotions that shake the tortured soul of man morse at the cowardice which had denied friend and acquaintance with that beautiful life now tormented and insulted out there on Golgotha.

Peter the fisherman! Rough, uneducated, pulsive, affectionate, shrewd, forward, noisy, asser capable of vast development, he sat there in the room, his mind dwelling on that scene in front o brazier of coals in the courtyard, the coals that w burn into his memory with indelible letters of fir denial of his Lord.

How it burned on his heart now! The one frien all the world who had loved him in spite of his coarse faults, his selfishness, his material se his overweening egotisms, the lovable companio the now memorable trips on the little lake in fishing boat, the charming teacher and healer, transfigured one who had chosen him as on the three, to reveal to him the ineffable glory of heaven-born estate—he, Peter, had denied that was a disciple, denied that he had even been see his company. In a transport of cowardice and he had seen the cross looming up for himself. now as he sat cowering there alone in the little r where he was hiding from the mob he could pic what was going on out there on the hill, for he seen crucifixions more than once, they were so comm in Jerusalem under the Roman law.

How long ago that seemed since they came arrest the Master in the garden! Since he, Peter, drawn a sword in the Master's defense! Since girl had come up to where he sat warming himself, had looked right into his eyes and said: "This m also was with him!" Since the mob had cried, in the courtyard of the Pretorium, "Crucify hi Crucify him!" Until in a panic of fear he had ta advantage of the darkness and the general tumult ity. How long ago that seemed since he had along in the shadow of the wall, through the w streets, weeping bitterly from remorse, seeing darkness the luminous face of his Lord as he had d from the place above and looked down upon Ah! That look would indeed penetrate every g place wherever he might wander now! For the heart by this time must be undergoing torture, nspeakable torture of crucifixion, and he, Peter, not bear to be present to look at it—or was it rdice and fear of arrest as a disciple?

W long had he been in this little room which he and John had taken for a temporary abode g Passover week? Out there on Golgotha, no t, while he sat cowering here, waiting for it all over! Merciful God! How long! Sometimes le lived a week on the cross and finally died of ation. At the thought of all the horrors of the Peter felt like shrieking aloud. And they had all ght that He would at the last moment smite the an power to the earth, sweep the war lord off his d throne and take the place of the Cæsars in a dom where his disciples would be prime ministers commanders. That was now all over! The soul of the Master was soon to be like all rs! His life was brief, his glory was a dream! only remorse left now for one disciple, to stalk gibbering ghost by his side through the dreary that lay ahead.

rely it could not be night yet!

e had taken no account of time since he had e in from the streets. But surely it could not ight yet!

ut the shadows were deepening!

was growing dark!

he sunlight had been coming in through that window high up on the wall.

here had it gone?

nd the floor was rocking under his feet!

ercy of God!

hat was occurring out there on Golgotha? Was Master indeed confronting the Roman war lord the superhuman power he had revealed when ad brought Lazarus to life?

was growing darker! He could hardly see ss the room.

or an instant he sprang up, almost minded to ar the door and rush out and up to Golgotha. onfused cries of terror were heard out in the ow street.

hen his strength failed. He fell back again is couch.

he darkness deepened until it was midnight k.

ow long he crouched there he never knew. pefied, smitten with fear, tortured with remorse, coals of that fire at which he had warmed self burning white hot on his heart, he lay like dead, but conscious of fear, for an uncounted iod of time.

hen he came to feel the blessed light again. again a long time passed, and a natural twilight vaded the little room.

till he lay there until he was roused by a knock he door.

IS enemies had come to seek him! The enemies who had killed his Master, the one he had ied! He lay there breathless with fear. The ck was repeated, and then a voice, John's voice, led on him to open and let him in.

eter rose and unbarred the door, and John, the oved disciple of the Master, entered. Peter hid face in his mantle. But John had no reproaches. own heart was smitten nigh to death by the nes he had just witnessed. After removing Mary his own home, where others of the women had hered during the Passover week, he had come the room which he and Peter had occupied close the Via Cæsaria.

Peter sat with covered face as John related what he d witnessed.

"Then he is dead already?" Peter asked finally.

"Yes," John replied after a sob of supreme anguish. he Master we loved is dead. The centurion pierced side with his spear and the blood gushed out. But , he died bravely! The Master! He cried with a out that rang out over the city. 'It is finished!' t our Master is dead, and we shall never see him ore!"

"The Master I denied!" cried Peter with a terrible ice. And John put his arm about him and tried to mfort him.

Together they sat as the night deepened.

"Joseph and Nicodemus have agreed to ask Pilate r the body," said John. "They told me they would ke it away to the garden at the foot of Golgotha. e Master commanded me to take Mary to my me. She fainted at the foot of the cross. We looked r a miracle when the darkness crept over the sky and e earthquake rocked the hill. But he died! His life s gone out, and we shall never see him again!"

Peter was silent. What could he say to the loved disciple? His heart was dead within him. sobbing sentences John recited over again the ents at Golgotha and how the Master's death was dden and his body unbroken.

And always the one theme to which the disciples came back was, "The Master is dead! We shall never see him again!"

So passed that night and the next day. John went out into the city only to return with the report that the disciples of Jesus were in danger of hourly arrest by the Jews. Peter trembled. He was still fearful. But John, drawn by an irresistible impulse to see the Master's last resting-place, had been to the burial spot, only to discover that a grim Roman guard had been stationed in front of the tomb. He did not dare venture nearer, and his news served to increase Peter's terror and anger.

"What! Does Pilate think we could steal the Master away? And of what avail? But woe is me! That I should live on the memory of that last look!"

THE day dragged on into twilight and twilight into deepest dark, and the two disciples continued together, held by the old companionship, while the women at John's abode prepared spices, according to the Jewish custom for burial, for the body of Jesus. The night passed slowly. Peter drowsed, his body worn but his spirit racked with grief and remorse.

Suddenly, with the first pale tint of dawn, a sound of voices and hurried steps came along the narrow street. A knock fell on the barred door. Both disciples were at once on the alert. The Jews were upon them!

"SHOWING HIMSELF THROUGH THE LATTICE"

By Carrie Judd Montgomery

(SONG OF SOLOMON 2 : 9)

A LATTICE work of wooden bars
  Obscures life's view, and shuts me in;
I do not see God's purpose kind,
  Or what my danger might have been,
If his great wisdom from above
Had not supplied this fence of love.

I make complaint, but as I gaze
  I see each bar meets with a cross,
And Calvary thus comes to view
  In every trial and grief and loss.
God nails each cross-bar fast and sure,
And thus my lattice is secure.

His grace now comes and fills my soul;
  I humbly bow at his dear feet;
The cross of Christ with light is crowned,
  And death and resurrection meet,
Until, oh, holy, wondrous sight!
My latticed bars shine in his light.

He shows himself through every cross;
  He speaks in words of living power:
"Come forth, my dove, from prison bars,
  For now has come thine Easter hour;
Arise, my love, and come away,
For death no longer holdeth sway."

The rain is gone, the winter past;
  The springtime violets appear;
The cloudless skies unveiled above,
  The birds sing hymns of hallowed cheer;
Rejoice, my soul, in life and light,
For banished are the shades of night.

He shows himself. "Rabboni, Lord!"
  My raptured, wondering heart outcries;
He shows his hands and feet, still scarred,
  And tenderly his love replies:
"Tell saddened souls I go before;
The tomb is empty evermore."

But no. The voices were those of women. Mary of Magdala and Mary the wife of Clopas, and Salome and others, a glow on their faces such as was never seen on human faces before!

The message they brought was unbelievable: "The Master is risen from the dead! The tomb is empty! Come, see the place where he lay! And he has gone into Galilee. There you are to meet him!"

John started forward. But Peter fell back on his couch and covered his face with trembling hands.

"I cannot meet him! He will not want to see me—if indeed this miracle is true, I denied him!"

Mary advanced into the room and came close to Peter. "But the angel at the tomb, speaking the message of Jesus to us, said, 'Tell the disciples, and Peter!'"

Peter rose up, his face quivering.

"Did he say that! Oh, my Lord and Master! I will die for thee at that word!"

He was out of the room, pushing past the pale but glowing faces of the women. John followed. They ran side by side, but, going out of the Jaffa gate, which was open at sunrise, as they breasted the hill John gained on Peter, whose emotions retarded his pace.

There, at the foot of the second slope, lay the tomb! Around it stretched the forms of the Roman guard, their helmets fallen from their heads, their spears lying where they had dropped out of their nerveless hands.

John ran on alone, and saw to his amazement that the great circular stone had been rolled back. He reached the entrance and paused. The panting Peter was close behind. John kneeled and, shielding his eyes, peered fearfully into the tomb.

But Peter, running up, did not hesitate. He walked in over the groove where the stone had been set and with beating heart, experiencing a sensation such as few of earth's mortals have ever known, he looked around in the pale cold light.

The linen cloths were on the stone floor. But the towel which the custom of burial laid on the dead face was folded up and lay, a mute witness to the quiet characteristic habit of neatness belonging to the Master, who, even in the unprecedented act of coming to life, had taken time, before leaving the burial place, not afraid of its memory, to fold up that which loving hands had spread over his countenance.

The entrance was darkened. John came in, trembling with awe. Together the two men stood and looked and were convinced of the astounding fact that the Master had arisen.

BY ONE impulse they turned and went out, to set their faces towards Galilee.

Peter could not wait, but John was detained to see his mother and warn the others of the words of the Master.

"Where?" questioned Peter as he hurried northward,—"where more likely will the Master show himself than somewhere around the Lake where I first met him?"

So, like a sailor who smells the ocean from afar, even when deep inland, Peter sped northward to Tiberias.

But when he reached the familiar spot some of the disciples were there waiting, but had not yet seen the Master. For some time Peter restlessly wandered around the shores of the Lake, sought out and repaired his boats and nets, and one day, to fill the time, not doubting the Master would appear, he said to Thomas the Twin, "I am going fishing."

With Thomas that day were Nathanael of Cana, the sons of Zabdi, and John, who had come up from Judea.

These were all down by the shore and they all said, "We will go with you."

So they all set out together in one of the larger boats and fished all night but did not catch anything.

Day was dawning. The disciples prepared to go ashore.

What was that form there on the beach? A voice came over the water:

"Children, have you any food there?"

They cried out, "No!"

The voice came over the water again:

"Throw the net on the right side and you will find fish."

John and Peter hauled up and cast as bidden by the stranger. But when they started to haul in again they were unable without help, the net was so heavy.

"It is the Master!" cried John, anticipating Peter's exclamation.

But Peter sprang into the water and started to wade ashore. There stood his Master whom he had denied! But when Peter fell on the beach at his feet Jesus was looking at him, not with reproach but with yearning love. He said simply to Peter, "Go and bring some of the fish and we will breakfast together."

How naturally and brotherly he spoke! Peter was about to break out into a torrent of plea for forgiveness but it did not seem necessary. When he came back with a basket of fish the disciples had gathered about a fire Jesus had kindled and fish were already broiling on the hot coals.

WHILE Peter prepared other fish the Master spoke to all, as he always had. But after they had appeased the hunger of out-door men Jesus turned directly to Peter, who had not, even while eating, taken his great yearning eyes off the person of his Lord, and while the other disciples noted and listened Jesus said:

"Simon, do you love me more than these other disciples do?"

Peter, his heart bursting with memory of that denial, humble in the thought of that other fire in the courtyard, did not venture to answer the question of Jesus directly, but he said, "Yes, Master, you know you are very dear to me."

Jesus said to him: "Then feed my lambs."

After a moment of silence in the little group Jesus said again, "Simon, son of John, do you really love me?"

"Yes, Master," Peter answered, still humbly feeling his unworthiness to use the strong word which Jesus had used, "You know well you are dear to me."

"Then be shepherd to my sheep," said Jesus.

There was another silence, while Peter stretched out his hands to the fire which Jesus had kindled.

Then suddenly a third time Jesus said, using Peter's words this time: "Simon, am I dear to you?"

Peter looked up and tears were in his eyes.

"Master," he said with humble heart, "You know everything. You know that you are dear to me!"

IN GERMANY

By MARGARET E. SANGST

With the American Army of Occupation at Cobl

GERMANY is a dark, forbidding country—a country of black forests, and stern hills, and gaunt boulders. It is beautiful in a way, yes; but the beauty of it isn't a calm, happy beauty. Its charm is a sinister one, its picturesque landscapes are strangely furtive. It is a country that might well be peopled by the strange misshapen gnomes of its folklore, by dwarfs and dragons and devils.

Many Americans have wished that our army might have met the German army on its own ground; that American guns might have turned a few German towns into the pitiful ghosts that the French villages have become. But as my train left the rolling fields of France and began to go through deep ravines and over high bridges I thanked God that the armistice had been signed before our men set foot upon German soil. For the retribution that many dreamed of would have taken a terrific toll in American lives—a sweeping sensational victory would have meant tens of thousands, a needless sacrifice, added to our casualty lists.

Coblenz, where America guards the Rhine

The hills of Germany are scenically wonderful. But they would have been almost insurmountable barriers to our heavy artillery. And the dark valleys and crags would have made perfect nests for machine guns, nests from which our men could have been mowed down. And the rivers of Germany—swift flowing, treacherous rivers—would have been very nearly impassable. The American artillery would have conquered those hills, the American doughboys would have crossed those valleys and forded those rivers, though they ran red with blood. They would have beaten Germany to a standstill on her own territory if necessary—be sure of that! But it wasn't necessary.

SOME folk have said that Germany was defeated because of her food shortage—a shortage that is vividly apparent to the most casual visitor. A waiter in a hotel told me, in broken English, that the private families are allowed only one pound of potatoes and one loaf of black bread a week, and I have heard—from the American soldier—that it is very nearly impossible, in the smaller towns, to get meat or butter or fats of any sort. There is, apparently, no real coffee in Germany—the people drink something that is made of parched corn—and there is little sugar to be had, and scarcely any milk. Eggs, when one can get them, bring a price that approximates, in American money, about forty cents each. And there is no fruit at all.

And yet, despite the food shortage, the German people could have lasted through another winter of war and perhaps another summer. They could have managed to live on their black bread and their grain substitutes, unpleasant though they are, and their make-believe coffee for quite a while longer. It was not the food shortage that ended the war. It was something very different, something that a soldier now on the editorial staff of the "Stars and Stripes" summed up very accurately as "the United States and the wallop back of it!"

"It wasn't so much that the Germans were hungry or scared," he said, "for they weren't. It wasn't that they couldn't have gone on a bit. It was the sheer youth and bravery and recklessness of our army that finished them. Temperamentally they were unable to understand the sort of fighting that we were capable of. They couldn't quite figure out what our men would do next. Trained to the *n*th power of efficiency, it floored them to meet troops that could advance so fast that their supplies and ammunition were left behind. It shocked and surprised them to see our splendid inefficiency—an inefficiency that made us go ahead, disregarding all rules of care and personal safety. They realized that, though they might kill a great many of us, there were others, millions of others, where we came from. And so we beat them."

THE people of Germany are surprisingly kind to the men who are quartered upon them. I went, myself, into Germany with a feeling of intense dislike toward everything German; I went with a feeling of disgust that was almost akin to fear. But after only a few days in Germany I came away with my mind in a more or less chaotic state.

The attitude of the German people toward the American soldier is a strange and alarming attitude. And the American soldier's attitude toward them is just as strange and just as alarming. For he admits freely that he likes the people very much indeed.

"They're good to us," one boy told me. "Why, I was sick, awhile back, and the woman whose house I'm billeted in, she brought me hot milk—and I'll say that it's hard to get milk here! And they wash our clothes for us, and mend them. And they don't have to. . . ."

It is a dangerous attitude, this attitude that is being taken by the American soldier in Germany. But it's an attitude that is quite understandable. For our men are the sort of men who are kind and tolerant and friendly—much more so than the English, who have stood for four years against the German line, or the French, who have seen their homes broken and their children maimed. Our men are fond of warmth and laughter; they respond with an unsuspicious readiness to any attention.

I can understand the proposition that the American soldier is up against, for I was billeted in the house of a German woman for three days. I was the only civilian in town, and I had been thrust unceremoniously into that house. And I think, if I had been the woman, that I would have resented the intrusion—and shown that resentment.

It was a poor little house. It was cold and cheerless, and there wasn't much food standing about. But it was a painfully neat place, and the woman brought me a down-filled coverlet, the first night that I was there, and a foot-warmer. And she brought me generous slices of bread from her small store, and great cups of the steaming substitute coffee. And, quite miraculously, she made me feel, not that I was being forced upon her, but that I was an honored guest. Her hospitality was disarming, complete.

Why are the German people being so kind to our soldiers? For every soldier quartered with a German family is being made to feel, just as I was made to feel, like a welcome visitor. Why are they being so kind? They are, of course, under strict military rule, and they must submit to any American wish or desire. But no military rule and no forced submission can account for the extreme friendliness of them. It seems to me that there are only three solutions: either they feel a great joy at the ending of the war, or a great relief because our men, who have less to forget than the men of other armies, are quartered upon them; or a new and terribly subtle propaganda is being launched.

The first two solutions are the solutions that one would like to believe. But it is the gigantic possibility of the third that fills the observer with fear. For, despite rigid rules against fraternizing with the civilian population, our men are beginning to know and be fond of the families that they are quartered with—which is only natural. One can't live close to any people without coming to love or to hate them. And there is nothing hateful in the apparently simple folk that our boys are billeted with.

The men in the Army of Occupation come from every state, from every city, from every town almost, in the Union. What will be the effect when they come home and say, as one young and too trustful soldier said to me,

"I don't know why we were fighting the German people. I like them!"

It was a doctor with the American Red Cross in Germany who answered the soldier.

"Son," he said, "many of the German people may be nice people like the rest of us—I don't know. But, after all, it wasn't the German people that we were fighting. It was the military party—the iron rule of the army—that we had to crush. The German people were perhaps acting hysterically under a brutal leadership, a leadership that we've—please God—wiped off the face of the earth! The German people know that they're beaten, and now, under a new leadership, it's our job to make them worth-while citizens of the world!"

The German people may know that they are beaten. And yet, in an obscure little German toy shop, one day, I saw a flash of arrogant spirit.

I was buying soldiers, t diers, to take back to a little boy in New York. I fingered them I noticed su that, though there were mi French and English and G soldiers for sale, there w American soldiers. I spoke omission to the shopkeeper.

"Why are there no sold the United States?" I quest

The shopkeeper tosse head.

"The United States—it long enough in the war!" sh me.

"You mean," I asked, you have not had time, sin United States came into th to have them made?"

"Oh, no!" answered the an, and she laughed—"the States was not in the wa enough to count."

The American sergeant was with me interrupted.

"What do you mean by he questioned. "The States was in the war long enough to beat Germ

The shopkeeper looked back at us, unflinch from across her counter.

"Germany was not beaten," she said, at last, many just stopped fighting!"

IF THE more or less casual visitor finds it ha look beneath the calm surface of German liness to the sharp rocks of German propaga is much harder for the soldier to judge—the who is forced day by day to meet that friendl It is hard for him, no matter how clearly he to see things always in their true light.

The doughboy, in nearly every case, has been out of the danger and dirt of trench life and set in a pleasant and extremely clean German home is put there with strict instructions as to leavi family alone, but because he usually has no partic pleasant place to spend his evenings, no partic desirable way to relax mentally and physicall goes from his mess directly to the house that quartered in. And there he is bound to see a c cordial, delightfully intimate little family group welcomes him and seems really to like him.

At first, perhaps, he thinks that the liking is affe He suspects it. Then, despite his suspicions, he to admire the cleverness back of the cordiality. he begins to wonder whether it is all affectation, all. His loneliness and boredom respond to the ant advances. And he finally comes to the co sion that, although most of the German people treacherous, the ones that he is quartered with exceptions. And he ends by liking them, in spi himself.

IT IS, I think, the greatest problem today b the American Expeditionary Forces—this pro of killing the new propaganda of the German na For if every boy who is quartered upon the civ population of Germany goes home with a glo story of good treatment and kindliness, the great pose of the war will be in a measure defeated. boy who is quartered in Germany is on a fair to losing sight of the thing that, a few months he was ready to die for—he is losing his perspec and his sense of proportion because he is lo and lacks the personal comfort that goes to make alluring.

Something must be done. If the boys canno taken away from Germany—if they cannot be lieved of the responsibility and the danger of ma a decision—they must be made to see just what propaganda can do—and is doing. There must means taken to break this last weapon of the undefeated enemy.

Our soldiers must be kept amused and enterta as much as possible in their recreation hours. must be warned against the cunning of the Ger people and the machinery that is back of them. the thoughts of home, the thoughts that keep id clean and hopes alive, must be put vividly into souls. And that last is your work.

For you in America have a big part to play in feating this propaganda. Your part is the writin splendid heart-warming letters that will carry the spirit of the home land to the ones across the For just at this time they need that spirit—that couragement—more than you will ever be able realize. Just at this time the home land and home people must be made doubly dear to th And when your special soldier sends home a re that seems almost to press-agent Germany and people of Germany, you must realize the abnor condition that he is facing and the real reason for point of view.

RAVES THAT MARK LIVING SPIRITS

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

LL over France one sees them—the graves of the men who died in action. Sometimes they stand side by side in a long row—sometimes are crowded close to each other in a ittle cemetery plot. Sometimes two ee of them are grouped together on oken site of what might have been a —sometimes a solitary mound stands at the edge of a town or village.

st of these graves, perhaps, are the s of French soldiers; but many of —heart-breakingly many of them— merican graves. And it is especially d these American graves that our d eyes are turning on this Easter asn't so long ago, in years, that our haki troops went across the sea. It t so long ago—not in years. But mother who sent a son, every wife ent a husband, and every girl whose heart was a part of some briskly movive drab column knows that the waitme can never be measured in years. e waiting time was a time of breathnxiety when eyes sought, first of all, ge of casualty lists in the daily paper ime when every letter from the far- boy was expected for days, and was prayerfully when it finally arrived. s a time when the lack of a letter d anguish. It was a time when star- meant more than it ever had meant— se the same stars were shining with me light three thousand miles away. s a time of ready tears and tremulous Ah, no; the waiting time can never easured in years!

d now, across the springtime sea, of them are coming home—coming to the almost reverent welcome that s them. They are coming back, ger in mind and body—braver and r and better. They are coming back a splendid new assurance of values, ideals that have stood the test, with a n manhood and an unfaltering cour- They are coming back to homes that are filled with joy and gladness—most of them. And the others . . .

Oh, friends of mine, I have seen the graves of these others—the identified flag-marked graves; and the ones that aren't even marked by a cross. And I have felt at first the momentary bitterness that any American would feel upon seeing them, so far from the home-land; and then I have felt a sudden tear-blinding pride in my countrymen who have given the ultimate sacrifice and paid the great price. And, after that surge of pride, I have felt the faith that is a part of the Easter time, a part of the great plan of life.

Many centuries ago a Man proved that the grave is not the end of everything. He knew the humiliation of a taunting multitude, he endured the searing agony of the cross, and he must, too, have felt the bitterness of failure when he cried through his suffering "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" And yet, after three days, he came back to prove it. He proved it when the spring was in the air—proved it in the sunlight and among new flowers. And now, across the years, these other men —bred of a splendid race—have proved it, too.

For these men who died in France are not really dead—and they never will be. The mounds, whether they be marked or unmarked, cover something vital and living. They cover the realization that death is a great adventure—an adventure that may be met fearlessly with a singing heart and a stanch soul. They cover the wonderful assurance that the principles of God are worth suffering for; that the laws of humanity will never be forgotten.

They are not our dead. They are our promise of faith, our pledge of victory. They are just hero-boys, staying in a land that they crossed an ocean to save, staying in the war-worn fields that shall again bloom with flowers. They are not our dead. They are more than that. They are the ones who are staying, for us, to keep an eternal guard.

A Prayer on Easter for Our Boys Killed in Action

DEAR God, they will not come again, those lads of ours,
Who went to fight with honor's foe across the sea—
Who died with eyes set straight ahead, amid the showers
Of shrapnel, as they cleared a path to victory.
They will not come again . . . And it is Easter weather,
And all the world is waking to the call of life,
But they lie sleeping, Over There, our lads, together,
Who died before their hearts could know the end of strife.

Dear God, they will not come again, those lads of ours,
Who left this land so gallantly to do their best—
And so I ask that You will send gay springtime flowers,
To deck each shell-torn meadow where their bodies rest.
I ask that You will let them hear the joyous singing,
Of some deep-throated bird whose heart tones throb and swell;
God, let them feel the thrill that Easter time is bringing,
That death is only life asleep—and all is well!
Amen.

SONGS OF EASTERTIDE

An Easter Message

By Harriet Whitney Symonds

AS passes Lent, austere and gray,
An overflow of blooming grace
Transforms into a bower gay
The grim old city market-place;
Like lamps of porcelain, branching high,
Great flowers, creamy-cupped, are set
Beside wee blossoms, frail and shy,
With springtime raindrops cool and wet.

And, passing by, a wanderer,
Returned from lands Arcadian-fair
Where citron-apples, warm as myrrh,
Drip soft metheglin in the air,
Stands silently, with breath indrawn
As one who purest incense drinks,
Before a cluster tinged like dawn—
A pot of sweet, old-fashioned pinks.

As, eager-eyed, he tarries there
Intent upon those rosy sprays,
The city's noisy thoroughfare
Is blotted from his wistful gaze,
And, drowsing in the morning light,
A village street before him lies,
Adown whose length, in airy flight,
Drift flocks of golden butterflies.

Clear-toned and rising to a gush
Of crystal melody a-wing
Upon the country's Sabbath-hush,
The Easter bells are caroling
Their wonder-story, ever new,
And in its rich cascades of sound,
From door-yard plots aglint with dew
The breath of garden pinks is wound.

"The Lord is risen"—across the years
That long have held the rover's feet
Astray in alien paths, he hears
The Easter anthem, healing-sweet;
And as from out the meeting-place
Again the joyous measures flow,
He sees each calmly steadfast face
Alight as with a holy glow.

. . . .

From tumult of the city's tide,
As comes the dusk in stole of gray,
With low-bowed head stands one aside
Whose gaze is rapt and far away;
For, o'er the misty gulf of time,
To that dear faith he used to know
They call his soul with echo-chime—
The Easter bells of long ago.

Easter Dawn

By Elsye Tash Sater

"'TIS Easter dawn," the lilies say,
"And Christ, our Lord, is risen to-day.
Let every heart be glad."
But in God's acre far away,
He lies, who once was blithe and gay;
My heart with dole is sad.

"What means the Easter dawn to me?"
I asked in gray despondency;
"My life is drenched and dead."
The lilies quivered as in pain.
"The one you love will live again,
And ever live," they said.

"Since Jesus lives, we cannot die,
For us He came on earth to buy
A life eternal. There,
Within a mansion safe, they too
Now live, the dearest ones we knew,
Secure from pain and care."

"O lilies, teach my heart to sing
This anthem of your risen King,
That I may learn to live."
Their fragrant censers looked at me
In love, and whispered tenderly:
"Yourself more freely give."

Corpus Christi

By Edna M. LeNart

HASTE, flaming torches of advancing dawn,
Unto the Tomb, confirm its vacancy,
That every eye in certain day can see
It is no dream of worn centurion,
Nor any parable of Gentile lore,
That Christ hath risen and goeth on before
His very mourners into Galilee.

Passing mid lilies redolent with prayer—
White as the wings which seraphim unfold
In grace above their coronets of gold,
Or as the robes triumphant saints will wear—
He blesseth by his presence in the way
Each creature waking to eternal day;
Ere this God's purposes were but half told.

His flesh was rent apart on Calvary,
Those veins which opened at the spear's mad thrust
Gave priceless blood unto the very dust:
Yet not all hell could change the prophecy
That not a bone of him should mortals break
Nor worldly kings from him his portion take While high above earth's darkness reigned the Just!

And so, though torn by many a man-made creed
The garments of our faith still seem to be,
The firm foundation of our hope is He.
Bruised, but surviving every foe, the seed
Sown by His Word in stanch and fertile ground
Will bloom till all its flowers of Love abound;
For what shall vanquish Immortality?

The quiet brookside banks have trod,

When Temptation Comes

IN A little volume of Lenten essays by the late Dr. Hamilton Wright Mabie, we find an old thought in a new guise. Temptation comes to all men at some time, and has ever done so. The tempter, wise from long experience, assumes many forms, in each of which he bears himself according to the fashion of the time and expresses the thought of the age. He has long ceased to wear the face of the demon and the garb of the outlaw: he has become respectable; he knows the moral and social conventions, and as long as it serves his purpose, he observes them. No longer repulsive to the eye, he is more malignant and spiritually hideous than when he tempted our first ancestors. "Today, though he is the father of lies, he wears the air of truth." In the first temptation, the lure to his victims was, "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." In the Great Temptation, his promise was, "All these kingdoms will I give thee." History is filled with repetitions of this kind of temptation, all of which, save that one which was staged "on an exceeding high mountain," were successful for the tempter and ruinous to his victims.

Human nature, unless spiritually reinforced, is ill-fitted to combat temptation. The latter comes to us in so many varied forms and cunning disguises; it makes so many specious promises that appeal to our desires, our friendships, our social and business aspirations; and it employs arguments that seem so conclusive that we lack skill to controvert them. It is only when we have yielded, and we find too late that the path we have taken leads to shame, dishonor and danger, that we realize the cost of acquiescence, the misery of disillusion, the shame and regret that fill the heart and cloud the whole life.

To fight the battle against temptation we must have divine help. Then, and then only, shall we be steeled and panoplied against the tempter. Even his shafts and darts of evil counsel and suggestion will fall harmlessly at our side, his promise will lose that power to win us, and all his lies will be unmasked. He whose word is true has promised to succor us if we call upon him when we are tempted.

Ready for the "Victory Loan"

NEXT week will witness the launching of the Victory Liberty Loan, the final effort in which every good American should help in order that the whole nation may "see it through." That the war ended at least a year earlier than could have been expected, everybody now concedes. We were fortunate in being the means of bringing the terrific struggle to a satisfactory conclusion so early. It was American dash, high morale and excellent leadership that turned the tide. We fulfilled every material promise made to our Allies, and always ahead of time. Even if the fighting had lasted many months longer, so complete were our preparations that the final result could never have been in doubt. But all this gigantic work of preparation, while absolutely indispensable, cost big money.

And now comes the fifth and last loan of the series, rightly called the Victory Loan, which is ready to be subscribed. As the Allies joined forces in the great victory drive, so let us here at home unite in putting the Victory Loan right "over the top." It should be distinctively a People's Loan. And why not, since every bond bought is just so much money well invested? Think of all the loans that would have been needed had the war lasted one year more.

We owe it to Uncle Sam, to our soldiers and to ourselves, as an honorable and patriotic duty, to see the Loan through. With a high interest rate, and a shorter maturity than any previous loan of the series, it has a special appeal to investors. Besides, this is the clean-up Loan, and when it is finished it will make a clear road for better business, better feeling and universal satisfaction.

The Saloon's Successor

WHILE the American saloon was a cancer, a hideous blot on our nation, it nevertheless served a purpose which will need to be met by some other agency. It held a precarious hold on life for years through its plea that it was the poor man's club. It furnished him a light, warm place to go. It made available to him a certain democratic comradeship. It was more than a guzzling shop, although guzzling was the source of its profit; it was a focal spot where men of all kinds met on an equal footing. But the good in it was inseparable from the bad, which outweighed it. So the saloon had to go. Now America must find a substitute.

In places where the saloon is now a forgotten episode of sorrier years, it has been found that it has already several substitutes. One of the first results of the closing of the bars has been a greatly increased patronage of the movies; in fact, the movies have for some years been cutting into the saloon income. Another result has been a marked increase in normal home life. Still another result has been a widening of church activities. Men's clubs, men's forums, men's Bible classes, have been better patronized and have shown marked increase in membership. The church with a good plant can do a great deal toward filling the place in the social life of men which the saloon occupied.

One thing that made the saloon what it was, was the fact that every man paid his way. It was by no means a charitable institution. It was organized for business. The substitute, to be a real success, must be along similar lines. It must be something that can be supported by its patrons; it must have no atmosphere of charity. A community club, organized on a simple basis, offering light, warmth, games, meeting-rooms, and such refreshment as will be consistent with the law, has been suggested as a substitute. It ought to work.

A substitute for the saloon is certain to be found. It may in many respects resemble the European café. When it is found, it will prove profitable, more profitable than the saloon ever was; for it will be free from the burden of the license fee the saloon had to pay, and it will be free also from the taint of partnership with crime which kept the saloon under suspicion. It must be fully democratic in origin and operation. Booze classified men sharply; the rich man had his club and his cocktail, the poor man his mahogany bar and his beer. The saloon was democratic within the field of its clientèle; the substitute must boast a wider democracy. What shall it be?

Conscience and Guilty Fears

IF TOM NAST, the famous cartoonist of Tweed Ring times, had been living in these days, he would doubtless have found in the attitude of the Hohenzollern exile and his military chiefs a strong theme for his artistic pencil. From the ex-Kaiser at Amerongen to the last member of his general staff all are on the grill and fearful that they may get a thorough roasting. The ex-Crown Prince, apparently plunged in unrelievable gloom, dreads the prospect of being executed should he ever be brought to trial. Hindenburg says little, but even he takes the opportunity to blame another. Ludendorff has written a book to assert his own innocence, and so on with the rest of the coterie who terrorized Europe less than a year ago. All see the shadow of the hand of justice and inwardly dread its grasp. On one thing alone they are unanimous: that somebody else than themselves is the guilty party.

Harold Begbie gives us a weird picture of the ex-Kaiser, which seems to suggest to the average reader that Wilhelm has long been mentally unbalanced. He unloads the burden of blame upon his ministers and generals, in whose hands he claims to have been a helpless puppet; yet almost in the same breath he declares that there "is no power on earth" that can subject him to a trial. As if in disavowal of this boast, he then adds gloomily that, if he were to be tried before an international tribunal, "he would destroy himself." "Thus conscience does make cowards of us all," and the Shakespearian observation certainly seems to fit the case for Wilhelm, who seems to fear he would fare equally ill before either a German or an Allied court.

Personal Religion

VAST enterprises of an educational, missionary, and evangelistic character are to be undertaken in the era of reconstruction which has dawned upon us. These schemes are overpowering in their grandeur, bewildering in their magnitude. Doors of opportunity, closed and barred for centuries, are now swung wide open. Forces of sympathy and enthusiasm, dammed up for ages, are now being liberated with a momentum that will be felt in the farthest reaches of the universe. Those of us whose hearts are glowing with the assurance that our prayers are at last being heard are asking, What is the divine order? In the establishment and building up of the Kingdom, what is the program laid out by the will and finger of God?

First, a personal experience of God within our own souls. The supreme need of the Church at the present time is a revival of personal religion. There can be no aggressive enthusiasm or zeal apart from exp

The Princely Path to Peace

*A SERMON BY REV. ALVA MARTIN KERR

THOUSANDS of sorrowing men and women, in these days of war and disease, are seeking peace; and almost instinctively they turn to the Prince of Peace to learn how to find it. He, far above all others, is recognized the world around as the one who ws how to comfort the troubled heart. So a new widening interest attaches to the classical con- ation which he held with his disciples that last it just before his death. For on no other occasion he set forth the way to peace so completely and ngly as he did while he sat there in that upper mber talking over with those he loved the hard bitter things which so soon must come to them. ady he had consciously entered into the shadow is own passion and death, and yet he spoke in ect peace. He did not seem in the least troubled isturbed. After a while, in the Garden, he would e his own hour of lonely and hard-fought resigna-, such as every man and woman in grief must e; but it would be an hour of seeking his Father's , and not one of resentment or despair. There, he would be a Prince with a princely mission to the inevitable. Such a e he would leave with this little p of followers that so soon were to lunged into the sorrow of his death, m they adored, and into the con- on and hopelessness involved in the of his leadership.

Iow would he go about it? What ld he say in a situation of such utter ress and gloom? His way was entirely dif- nt from ours when we undertake to minister hose who mourn. He gave no profound osophy about death, like that with which ften we attempt in vain to comfort ourselves others. He did not try to persuade them t it was God's will and hence better so, as requently we even yet hear God made the hor of all kinds of wicked deeds and meful circumstances. Christ did nothing he kind. And we too will be wise when no longer strive for the meek acceptance "will of God" that any reasonable mind ht well question. Neither did he make arguments for immortality. He took that granted just as naturally as he spoke of orrow. He talked of nothing abstruse or demically difficult. In the simplest lan- ge, he told them plainly just the definite practical thing which they needed to do arry them through this experience.

Ie said: "Let not your heart be troubled." were as if he had told them, "I know, nds, that this is a sad day for us all. These tings and the changed future cannot be en lightly. Your minds are distressed and fused. But I plead with you not to allow r hearts to become troubled." That is first great step we are to take along the ncely way to peace—that the heart be not troubled. There is always coming more or less to disturb the sical life. Disease and pain are a common lot. ner or later the hand will lose its cunning, and he o has been strong will grow weary. This is an inevitable fact; but it need not spoil the life of any one. There are things yet better and more enduring than the physical. Then, too, the life about us will change. Familiar things will pass away. Desirable things will fail us. There is ever a shifting that keeps our environment at unrest. The same is true with the mind. It cannot be shielded from problems which worry and distress it. The questions of business and society perplex us. The very ties of love and friendship which most ennoble us ofttimes sore trouble us. In a thousand ways we would be driven to despair if there were nothing to life but these surface things which constantly change and disturb us. But down underneath them is a current which is unchangeable. There is a contentment that has nothing to do with either poverty or wealth. There is a satisfaction and peace which are not contingent upon life or death. And in these deeper things the heart of man must find rest.

This is what Christ meant. He would have us see that, after all, the disturbing elements of life are only the waves and the foam, tossed by every wind that blows; but that deep down is the great sea of life, calm and undisturbed. The fortune, in the gathering of which we have so completely worn ourselves out, goes; but why need we allow that to ruin us, when the warm arms and the lips close-met are with us still? They are the far better part, and so long as they remain we shall lose our joy in life only if we have permitted our hearts to be consumed by the sordid love of material comforts and gain. Health goes, but love remains—and love that may be all the sweeter and more tender because it has been refined and purified by pain.

LET not your heart be troubled:
Ye believe in God,
Believe also in me.
In my Father's house are many mansions;
If it were not so, I would have told you.
I go to prepare a place for you.
And if I go and prepare a place for you,
I will come again,
And will receive you unto myself;
That where I am,
There ye may be also.

There was never a more blighting lie uttered than the common saying that "Health is everything." For it simply is not so. Sooner or later, every home must have a share of sickness, and many are condemned to poor health all of their lives. It is a pathetic tragedy that so many should assume that all the good and the usefulness have gone out of life the moment disease comes in. They indulge in morbid self-pity and irritability and are ever seeking the commiseration of others. They neither forget nor permit any one else long to forget their own physical discomfort. And thus they make the bad matter infinitely worse because they accept the falsehood that health is the main thing. But there are thousands who have learned that there is a wealth of love and happiness and contentment which lie far beneath any physical condition; and in spite of their sickness or of the sickness of their home, they are a source of joy and happiness to all who know them. There are many cheerful, hopeful invalids who would be a benediction to any community, for they have learned that life is more than the body.

Death comes! The hardest of all is to find the underlying peace when death robs us of a loved one. It seems that it has taken all that is or can be. And yet death is the universal experience. We know that sooner or later it must come, and we really would not have it otherwise. Surely there must be some redeeming quality even in it to soften its sting and anguish. And there is. For there are sweet and beautiful deeps of life that even death cannot reach. The memory of those who are gone, the grave cannot claim it; but will only sanctify it as a most precious blessing. All that was sweetest and best in their life remains with us as a hallowed influence. There seems to be a vital companionship with our dead, a charmed and mystic nearness that molds and shapes us. These sacred things of the heart cannot be disturbed, neither taken away.

This is the first princely step to peace. We must learn to rest in the deep and unchangeable, confident that the worst which may come will never be able to rob us of the best of life.

Then Christ said to those disciples that night: "Ye believe in God, believe also in me." He wanted them to hold fast to the fixed and the eternal while they readjusted themselves to the changes which were coming. Their faith was about to break and let go under these new conditions. That for which they had lived and planned and hoped, that in which they had believed, was disappearing. Their hearts had been centered on Jesus as a Friend and Leader, and had dreamed great dreams of the part that they were to have in the earthly kingdom they thought he would establish. But now that he was about to leave them, and as their hopes came crashing down about their heads, they simply did not have faith enough to believe in him during such a catastrophic change.

But those Jews all believed in God with an instinctive faith. It was the heritage of their race. They relied upon God. They trusted God implicitly. Christ would have them to take what they could believe in, what they could trust in, and project their faith from that to him in the terrible hour of change. If they would only hold fast now and wait a bit, they would learn after a time that it was expedient and best for them that he go away. This is the second princely step toward peace—to hold fast and wait in the profound confidence that something fine and good shall somehow be worked out in the new day that has come.

It is the enforced readjustments in life which most trouble us. Our greatest fret and worry is because that for which we had planned and lived is being taken from us. It may be that we have cared too much for money; and now the day comes when money will buy us neither health nor happiness. We stand with our hands full of it, dazed at how cheap a thing it is, and at how the best things of life and the only permanently satisfying things are above purchase and above price. Or we have depended too much on smiles and sunshine, and now smiles and sunshine are for the moment gone. We have lived in a gay round of health and pleasure. We have had neither time nor heart for the things which do not please or amuse us. But the wheel of fortune has now turned; and we are crushed to learn how empty and fragile that life is which has no religious purpose and no avocation for social betterment.

So have we set our hearts upon certain things, and now those things are taken away. How much of the time we plan for life and health and happiness! How few of us provide for the contingencies of sickness and sorrow and death! Yet these are inevitable; and when they do come, we are sore troubled to find our new adjustments. We begin to doubt the goodness of God and the wisdom with which he has planned the life of this world. And it is only a short step from that to bitterness and rebellion and ruin. Whenever men begin to cover things up in a mystery, and ask why this thing must be or that thing must be, or how God could allow this one to suffer or that one to die, they are coming very near the danger line where faith lets go and the heart gives up.

That is the grave peril of the pernicious theory that would make God the author of our misfortune and sorrow. For we impute to the direct act of God the sickness and death which, in our saner moments, we know come from causes that have universal and immutable application, and are not singled out just for our aching hearts alone. And the moment we do so, we start a

The League and the Church

By HON. JOSEPHUS DANIELS, Secretary of the Navy

THE war taught us that money and finance and labor were impotent against the cruel tyranny of autocracy. Indeed, we have come to see everywhere that the god of the dollar is dross, and that materialism has no power to bring comfort or endure with strength. The light of learning and science shone dimly as men groped their way through trenches or kept vigil on darkened ships. Commerce was tributary to war and agriculture was valued only as it gave sustenance to fighting men. Statesmanship was unable to avert the catastrophe.

The world as we knew it before the Hymn of Hate was translated into slaughter and cruelty no longer exists. In its place we had one portion of the so-called Christian nations, composing the Central Empire, maddened by the lust of blood, and the other portion suddenly called upon to accept slavery or take up arms to preserve their own freedom and the liberty of future generations. In this modern Armageddon, all things which seemed stable have perished, and troubled men and women looked in vain in all that man had created for consolation and inspiration and valor. Stoicism alone of all the false creeds remained to those who had courage without faith in God, and while it imparted bravery in battle it gave no warmth to the heart, no glow to the countenance, and no radiance in death. As one by one the old foundations upon which they builded were swept away by the tide of battle, men struggled in the rushing waters for a life-preserver, not for their bodies, but for their souls. They did not find it in arms or munitions, in craft on or under the sea, or in the airy navies grappling in the central blue. They did not find it in the philosophy of fatalism, in the hopeless creed of unbelief in a future life, in the gods of war and passion, or even the gods of ambition and resolution. In the blackness of the might of conflict no earthly glimmer brightened the pathway of nations or individuals. Science and art and music girded no man with strength in the hour of endurance.

Religion alone abides in the hearts of men. We may not understand why God permits war, our faith may at times falter, but the only sure anchor to the soul is the knowledge that God is in his heaven, and that after the thunders of war he will give us to see that in the better days before us "all is well with the world." It will be well with us because we were fighting in a righteous war. With no unholy or selfish aims, we are justified in the confident faith that God, who gave victory to our arms, will put it into the hearts of men to establish here on earth governments that promote peace and justice, freed from greed and self-aggrandizement.

This war was a challenge to Christianity. There are not wanting those whose faith in God has wavered because of the awful slaughter, and some have said this war shows that Christian civilization has failed. That is the superficial view. But it is not the true view. Christianity has not failed. It alone is the star of hope. A study of Prussianism discloses that in that country the state had usurped the place of God, and that spiritualism had given place to materialism. No people could wantonly wage war for spoils who had not repudiated the teachings of Jesus Christ. Prussia outwardly professed the religion of the Nazarene. Inwardly it has for years denied his teachings, and the fruit of its materialism is seen in its brutal war upon women and children. Men and nations may stand in the market-places and give lip-service, but it is true of nations, as of individuals, that "by their fruits shall ye know them."

Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels

Today the world in travail looks to the Church as the representative of the living God to recall men and women to the old Gospel, the only support, the only firm foundation, the only light. All other creeds have failed, all other foundations have crumbled, all other lights have gone out. To the glory of the churches, they have themselves had a new baptism, ascended the mountain-top and obtained a new vision, and are calling to a world resolved to preserve freedom to a new consecration. The war was not won by might alone. It was won by faith, by prayer, by the courage which God imparts to all who in their ho need look to him for guidance and for strength.

What of the church now in peace, in the transi days, in times of readjustment and reconstru "The morrow of victory is more perilous tha eve," said Mazzini, and Clémenceau upon the si of the armistice gave expression to the same when he told his people: "We are coming to a di time. It is harder to win peace than to win w After war and after elevation, comes the natur lapse from discipline and self-restraint. Acros seas religious leaders are unremitting in their se to men still in uniform, safeguarding the fruits of tory. Here at home, with hundreds of thousand young men, the flower of our country, being de bilized, the imperative duty of the Church is to giv Gospel welcome of good cheer and wholesome ho tality to these saviors of liberty. "Single men khaki ain't no plaster saints," said Kipling. Th young men do not all feel the need of continued discipline. The call to the Church is to throw aro them wholesome environment and enlist them in service of the Church. No gospel of negation appeal to youths who unafraid went over the The gospel which will win their fealty is the Go of sweetness and light, help to those who are wound employment to the capable, justice and brotherh with the music of joy and gladness. The founde the Christian Church said, "I am the Light and Way." No church can be of his fold which does run out to greet and to help the returning soldier sailor and extend fellowship to them and to all oth who stand in need of human sympathy and di guidance.

The churches of America have seen the vision of larger duty of the New Church in the New Day. T know that creeds and churchianity will neither men nor attract their attendance. Except churches of today be leavened with the spirit of Ch which is unselfish and whole-hearted service, will be "tinkling cymbals."

With this larger comprehension of opportu and responsibility, this Interchurch World Movem has been inaugurated. It is launched in a day w liberality has become a national habit and a nati asset, with higher conceptions of man's duty to fellows. We have Liberty bonds and Thrift stam and we will buy the next issue of Liberty bonds a expression of thanksgiving for the assurance of wo peace. We have contributed in war to every peal for welfare work. Now comes the appeal to organization that is the inspiration of all philanthro all benevolence, of all care for those in need, of good deeds in this life and all hope for immortal the Church of the living God. Having heard the to the useful reflected lights, we will not fail in call of the divine institutions which have the Light the World in their keeping.

Only Refuge from Anarchy

By HON. ARTHUR CAPPER, Former Governor and U. S. Senator-elect from Kansas

SIMPLY because we must, we are to have a League of Nations to end war, to end endless preparations for war, and to stop the huge outlays every nation now feels compelled to make even in peace times for armies and navies.

It is natural there should be great differences of view among leaders of opinion concerning such a league, or any form it might take. It seems that war is constitutional, and a compulsory peace isn't—no matter how badly the world needs it. A league to keep the peace of the world is as new and untried as once was a republican form of government. Circumstances compelled that experiment, and I think we shall find a way to cooperate in this one.

I am strong for a League of Nations, or some form of international agreement that will lessen the chances for war, and I shall work to that end. But I believe the document that has been submitted should be amended so that it will provide more definitely against the relinquishment of American policies and abridgment of the sovereignty of the United States. It should specifically provide that the Monroe Doctrine will not be infringed. We should contribute our share of the expense necessary to maintain force sufficient to compel peace, but we want to proceed cautiously when it comes to giving foreign nations, by majority vote of their representatives in the league, the power to say when and how this country shall send our boys to European battlefields.

I believe a League of Nations is inevitable if the world is to be saved from anarchy. Consider the situation: The people of every great nation are struggling under a mountain of debt. Four years of war have mortgaged their activities for years to come. If they are to go on squandering the major part of their labor and resources for big navies and large standing armies, and keeping out of productive labor the hundreds of thousands of men necessary to man them, we shall slowly but surely break the backs of the people.

As I see it, what this nation has most to fear in the future is not war, but our swiftly increasing burden of taxation, which is going to eat us up if we do not obtain relief by stopping up the big rat-hole of military expenditure and attain efficiency in government.

The war will add two billion dollars a year in interest charges alone to our taxes. Appropriations for virtually another two billions a year are asked in behalf of our army and navy. On top of this, we are urged to adopt compulsory military training for every boy of 19 in the land who can pass the physical test of fitness for soldiering. Our general staff has planned this so that it may have an army of twelve million reserves pledged to leave home and business instantly at the "call to the colors." Under compulsory military training draft and conscription will not be necessary.

A League of Nations should save us from this.

And there is that other possibility, worse than war, for which a League of Nations will be needed to save us. The history of every revolution and all causes leading to it, show that hunger was the spark that finally set off the powder magazine. As the struggle for existence grows greater, the tendency to revolt increases. The explosion point is reached when any considerable number of people are compelled to live from hand to mouth with no prospect for better times in view.

If we again go in for military program where shall we bring up?

Any program for a league to keep the peace between nations is sane and reasonable compared to tering on a program entailing consequences like the Is it strange, then, with such consequences in sig that people all over the world have demanded a deliverance a League of Nations limiting armame requiring every nation to give bond to keep the pea and pledging one another to keep the peace throu arbitration, and by force, if need be?

I am for any league plan based on the broad Am can principles of "the consent of the governed," league ruled by chosen representatives of the seve peoples instead of by great interests, which shall sa guard and protect the rights of citizens in their int national relations, which will protect backward pe ples from exploitation, and which shall reduce arm and navies to a police-force size.

We did not save the world in the world war; only gave it a breathing spell. But we can save with a League of Peace, one which is not a supernati but a binding, effective international agreement pe mitting every nation, great or small, that is a party, it to maintain its self-respect and individuality.

A League of Nations is not a visionary dream, foretaste of the millennium, nor the fad of an altruis it is sanely and compellingly practical, because t world cannot do without it, because the world cann and will not longer tolerate war between nations a more than we tolerate murder between citizens as method of settling disputes.

It took the great war to make a League of Nations pra tically possible through compulsion of circumstance The war showed all mankind the abyss into whi modern nations were about to plunge. We have ha a narrow escape, but I think we have stopped in time

CHRISTIAN HERALD ORPHANAG IN THE HOLY LAND

The Joy and Help "the Christmas Chest" Has Giv

A Letter from MRS. BERTHA VESTER of the American Colony in Jerusale

IN OPENING this morning's mail-bag, which had been forwarded to us from Jerusalem, the Christian Herald was handed out among the first. It is always a welcome visitor in our home and we hail its advent with pleasure. On opening and examining its contents our eye caught on the headline "The Christmas Chest and the Palestine Orphans." Can I describe to you the thrill of joy when I read that the generous readers of the Christian Herald were going to continue their beneficent assistance and keep our poor orphans in the Home they have learned to love? Nay, it is more than this; they will, by their Christmas gift, allow us to take more children into the Orphanage, who are pressing us to admit them into "God's House," as they call it.

We had not received the cable message to prepare us for its advent. By the same messenger who brought the mail-bag, we learned that some money had already arrived in Jerusalem in the Banco di Roma.

It is with heartfelt gratitude that the American Colony sends these lines to the readers of the Christian Herald, for their generous contributions contained in the Christmas Chest, which will enable us to continue this very successful and necessary work of mothering these motherless, suffering little ones in the land of the Child Jesus.

We have been beset with applications for admission from all over the country. This is one reason we took refuge in Jaffa until we should hear from you, for it was so hard to refuse. Very often the relative or friend would bring a little girl, sometimes accompanied by two or three whom they wanted us to admit, and the appealing look these girls would give us, and their thin faces and sunken eyes, telling of the late sufferi more than we could endure at times.

Many a fervent prayer had been that the friends of the Christian Hera friends, should feel their hearts touched orphans of Palestine and continue to this Home that has been started throug bounty and which has been so signally of God.

The change in these little girls is very and very pleasant to see.

At best the Oriental child is a sad cr but after four years of almost starvatio ness, death and anxiety, and nothing t them, their state was infinitely worse. I and relatives lost hope with so much su and often became very impatient wi children. I remember one mother com our gate one morning with a troop of littl She said they had gone to bed hungry, had only one small piece of bread each, t before, and "now they are crying and b for something to eat. Can I give the flesh to eat?" she said in despair. "I beaten and beaten them to make them quiet, and they still beg!"

It is needless to say that they all got breakfast. I mention this simply to giv an idea of what the children of this land through. I could give account after ac of fearful suffering.

Imagine the joy of our twenty-two girls when they found themselves surro by people who spoke kindly to them and them. That in itself worked wonders the children.

A doctor was employed to exam each child, and for the first month l visits had to be frequent; this last month he has not been called once.

Many of the eyes were infected with trachoma, the country's scourge. Most of them had enlarged spleens caused from continual malaria. They were about as sad a lot to look upon as you could collect.

What is the change in these short months? They look rosy and happy. New life has brought new joys, and ne joys have brought smiles. A the same faces that were bu short time ago so sad, so pinc and wrinkled, look like ha children's faces which would th with joy the hearts of their be factors, could they but see th now.

The new surroundings have brought the children new ideas. "Whence all this bounty? Who made the kind friends in America think of the poor little miserable, unattractive, dirty looking children in Jerusalem?" Then we tell them of the Child who lived here and who gave his life to save us, and for his sake we remember to be kind to our less fortunate brothers and sisters, for he said that to "love our neighbor as ourselves fulfilled all the law and the prophets." Then they wished to pray and thank this new Friend for all they had received. They did not forget their friends in America; they always ask me to send their love and gratitude to them.

So this is a message of gratitude from your little friends at the Home, and your big friends at the American Colony.

Eye-Witnesses on the Battlefields

Aside from the value of the history as a chronicle of great events, chapters are devoted to thrilling stories of heroic acts on the battlefields which command your admiration. These are personal experiences told by actual combatants in the field, both privates and officers. The prisoners of war have their stories to tell. The wounded who survive and the refugees rendered homeless tell stories that carry conviction with them and that would move a heart of stone. The fearful state of the battlefields is described by eye-witnesses. The story of the pirates of the sea, the enemy submarines, and how they worked in their slaughter of innocents, such as the ruthless sinking of the Lusitania.

THE SECRET TROUSSEAU

By Eleanor Harrison

Illustration by* Will Grefe

"They seemed so much prettier when I tried them on in my own room."

BOB and I are back from our honeymoon and living in the dearest little house in Maywood. Mother and father were out to end the evening with us last night and after nner, while father and Bob were having a good lk in the den, mother suddenly said:

"Eleanor, I have a secret. Let's go up in that zy back room and be comfortable while I tell u about it."

So we went upstairs and sat as we used to home—mother in a big, upholstered rocker d I on a low Turkish chair at her feet.

When we were comfortably settled, the first ing mother did was to put her hand inside r waist and, taking out something, she smiled d laid it in my hand. When I looked down, saw it was a crisp, yellow $100 bill!

"No, mother," I said, handing it back to her, I don't want you to give me that! You have ready given me too much and I know how sily you can use the money yourself. No, couldn't take it and feel right!"

"But it's really yours, Eleanor," she protested. And that's only part of my secret!"

But wait—I'm getting ahead of my story. Bob d I had planned to be married last May, but a few eeks before the date we had set his savings were wept away by the failure of a private bank and e had to start all over to save for our little home. I kept my position at the office and also opened savings account—with mother—toward the purchase of my trousseau. At noon or other times hen I could spare an hour or two, I would meet er by appointment at Harper's and she would elp me decide which suit, dress, coat or other arment I wanted. Then I would run back to y work and leave it to mother to pay the bill, ee that alterations were made and that the package was properly addressed for delivery.

I had decided to buy all my clothes ready-made. here were no good dressmakers nearer than hicago and, since I was buying "piecemeal" as I ccumulated the money, this would have meant trip to the city for fittings or some other purpose very few days. So we confided in Mrs. Merritt—ead of the ready-to-wear department at Harper's nd an old friend of mother's. She was more than elpful and I really thought I was doing very well.

WELL, we were married three weeks ago. When the wedding day arrived, my trousseau was complete with attractive, stylish and ecoming dresses, suits, waists and lingerie. I was delighted with everything! They seemed so much prettier at home than they had in the shop —not the least bit of a "ready-made" look about them when I tried them on in my room.

All the girls told me that my wedding dress was the prettiest they had ever seen. And when I had shown them all the new dainty things that made up my trousseau they couldn't believe that I had bought everything ready-made right in town. On our honeymoon, too, I could not help observing the admiring glances cast on my gowns and suits.

So—to come back to last night—when mother said the $100 was really mine, I felt sure that some mystery about my wedding clothes was going to be cleared up. But I had absolutely no idea of the real truth when mother drew my head close to her and began to tell me her secret.

"In a way I suppose I deceived you, Eleanor," she said, "but I prefer to call it a 'surprise.' Not one mother in a thousand could do what I did and really keep it a secret, because less than one girl in a thousand would ever be too occupied to attend to her own wedding finery. Several times I was sure you would guess my secret. But if you suspected, you never let me know. So I'm going to confess at last. I made every dress, suit, skirt, waist and piece of lingerie in your wedding chest myself!"

I knew, of course, that mother was telling me the truth—and yet I could scarcely believe it!

"But, mother, you never told me you could sew at all—let alone sew like that! Those are the most wonderful clothes I ever had! Why have you always let me think you couldn't sew any more than I could?"

"Well, I couldn't, dear," she smiled mysteriously, "until last Fall. I had never made anything more difficult than an apron in my life! But I had wished so many times that I could make pretty, stylish dresses for you and for myself! Of course at my age I couldn't go into a school or shop to learn.

"But one evening I sat in the library at home, reading a magazine, when I ran across the story of an institute of domestic arts and sciences that had developed a new and practical method by which any woman or girl—no matter where she might live—could learn right at home to make her own clothes and hats.

"Partly because I did so wish I could and partly out of curiosity I filled out the coupon at the end of the story. I figured it wouldn't cost me anything but the postage. And it meant merely that I wanted more information. Next day I mailed it on my way down-town, wondering whether there really could be a home-study plan by which a woman as ignorant about sewing as I could learn to 'design, draft, cut, fit, make, drape and trim even the most elaborate dresses.' That was what the article promised.

"WELL, in just a day or two the postman brought me a handsome booklet, telling me about the Woman's Institute and the success of thousands who already had become members—wives and mothers, business women, girls at home or in school, girls in stores, shops and offices. It also contained many voluntary letters the Institute had received from them praising its work and telling how much their courses had meant to them! Many of these letters were from mothers who expressed their delight in finding that they could learn in their own homes, at their own convenience, to plan and make stylish and becoming garments of all kinds for themselves and their children. And they could have them at a mere fraction of what such clothes would cost if bought in any other way.

"Many others wrote that the Institute had made it possible for them to succeed in dressmaking or millinery as a business. Lots of these women, I found, were older than I, and others were girls of fifteen or sixteen years. Their homes are in all parts of the world. The majority, of course, live in some part of the United States but there are hundreds in Canada and in foreign lands—all learning dressmaking or millinery at home just as successfully as if they were together in a school-room! Yes, and many others are learning cooking—the selection, preparation and serving of healthful, appetizing food at one-third less cost—which the Institute is teaching by the same proven methods.

"In the face of all the evidence, I couldn't help believing that I could do what thousands of other women had done so successfully!

"So, without telling anyone, I joined the Institute and took up Dressmaking. I could hardly wait until the first lesson came. And when at last it was in my hands, I went upstairs to my room and opened it almost breathlessly—like a girl with her first love-letter! I turned a few pages and looked at the wonderful pictures! There are nearly 2,000 of them in the dressmaking course alone and they illustrate perfectly every step that could possibly cause anyone difficulty. I learned eighty-three different stitches and seams in the first two lessons."

WHAT did father think of the plan?" I interjected.

"That is one of the few things I ever kept from him," said mother. "I didn't want him to say 'I told you so' if it didn't work out all right.

"I kept my lessons and my work hidden in my bedroom closet and studied them only while you and father were at business. But the course can easily be finished in a few months by studying an hour or two a day. I found I couldn't help making rapid progress. The teachers take such a deep personal interest in your work! And it must be pretty hard to make mistakes, for the textbooks foresee and clearly explain everything.

"The delightful part of it is that almost at once you begin actually making garments. Why, after the fourth lesson I made that pretty waist you thought I bought in Chicago!

"And so it went all the way through the course. I learned how to copy models I saw in shop windows, on the street or in fashion magazines. Every step was so clearly explained that the things which I had always thought only a professional dressmaker could do were perfectly easy for me! Best of all—the lessons taught me how to develop style in a garment and add the little touches that make all the difference between ordinary clothes and those of becoming charm and distinction!

"THEN, one day, the idea of proving the skill my course had given me flashed into my mind. I had just completed the lesson giving complete directions for planning and making a bride's entire trousseau. I had plenty of time and wanted to do it for you as a complete surprise. I wouldn't have thought it possible myself at the time—to save so much money on just your wedding clothes!

"The very first day we went shopping, I made up my mind how I could do what I had planned and keep it a secret from everyone at home. But I would have to let one person share it with me—Mrs. Merritt. She has been in charge of the ready-to-wear department at Harper's for years and we have been friends from girlhood. After you had gone, I told her about it. She agreed to try on you whatever garment you selected and fit you. Then after you had rushed away as you always did, I enlisted her aid in buying right there in the store the duplicate materials and trimming necessary to exactly copy the model.

"So I began work in earnest—and I didn't have the slightest trouble! Just once I got confused about your wedding dress. But I wrote to Mrs. Picken, Director of Instruction of the Woman's Institute, who had been so considerate all through my course, and she gave me just the help I needed on the point that bothered me.

"And so," mother finished, "that is my 'surprise,' Eleanor! I made every stitch of your trousseau myself, bought every bit of material and trimming and actually saved $100 on your outfit alone! Furthermore I have saved nearly $75 more by making over into garments of the latest mode a lot of out-of-date dresses and suits of my own—all through my membership in the Woman's Institute! Isn't it wonderful?"

"WONDERFUL?" I exclaimed. "Why, mother dear, it's simply miraculous! No ready-made clothes in all the world ever looked like those you made for me! And you have spoiled me—I shall never again be satisfied with the ready-made kind!"

So I have told you mother's secret—just as she told it to me. I've already arranged to join the Institute myself. And surely, what mother did—in saving $100 on just my wedding clothes—any woman can do over and over again on clothing for herself and her family!

Why not find out how the Woman's Institute can help you? The way is easy—simply write or fill out and mail the convenient coupon below. And you will receive—without obligation—a handsome booklet telling the full story of this great school which has proven such a wonderful blessing to women all over the world.

What Are the Substitutes for the Saloon?

THE saloon has offered something that men wanted, or it never would have enticed and held them. Now that the saloon is to go, can a substitute be found? If uplifting attractions are not provided, debasing ones will be.

Will the church prove itself adequate—if it is closed or cold except on Sundays and one or two evenings a week? The saloon is warm and doing business 108 hours a week.

What of the two billion dollars that have been squandered every year in drink and attendant vices? There must be teaching in thrift, in systematic saving, in home-making.

The substitute will vary with different localities, different communities and different nationalities.

Perhaps there is no panacea. But the able minds finding expression on this page offer helpful suggestions. Further opinions are forthcoming. The problem will be treated from every practical viewpoint.

Saving vs. Squandering

By JAMES H. COLLINS
Of the War Savings Organization

YOUR idea of linking thrift with the saloons is excellent. Figure a wage-earner drawing $20 a week, spending two dollars over the bar Saturday night and getting no permanent good, then the same man putting two dollars weekly into War Savings Stamps, and the growth in interest. That amount of money ($100) would buy twenty-five War Savings Stamps during the year, redeemable five years hence at $125.

It has been demonstrated hundreds of times over that the first pay day in a dry town is marked by an increase in sales at grocery and meat shops—people put money into food first. By the end of the first month money is being spent for clothes, the women and children getting the benefit first. Then come furniture, the savings banks, the building and loan association, the real estate man and all the other good constructive things for the people and the community.

Uncle Sam wants to see the nation keep up thrift habits acquired in war. To save money and lend it to the government by buying Thrift stamps is one objective—but only one, and that temporary. There is the bigger and broader and permanent job of encouraging wise spending, sound investment, elimination of personal and national waste, effective use of time and effort.

The Movies in the Church

By REV. ERNEST A. MILLER
Pastor, M. E. Church, Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio

I HAVE made the experiment of movies in the church and am more than ever convinced of their feasibility and power. In almost every church or community there is some one who has the ability, conviction and consecration to make church motion-picture work a success and a religious force. However, the minister should keep very close to the project. If he fully understands the religious educational value of films he will be willing to put motion pictures among the first things in his busy life.

Only the best in machines and equipment should be considered by the governing body of any church. Here, as almost everywhere, the best is the cheapest.

Every new church today should be built with a suitable and commodious assembly room which may be used for motion-picture purposes. This room may serve many purposes, but, in the not distant future, there is going to be an insistent demand for moving pictures in every progressive church. In old church buildings the Sunday school auditorium may be used. Sometimes partitions will have to be removed in order to increase seating capacity; adjustments and alterations will be fully justified by the increased serviceableness of the church plant through the medium of this new public benefactor.

The Movies as a Substitute

By ORRIN G. COCKS
Secretary Affiliated Committee for Better Films

HAVE you considered the motion picture as the logical successor of the saloon?

The saloon is passing into oblivion, and with it much of the lure of liquor. Business, war, food necessities, and moral sentiment, all have combined to push it into the grave. But human nature is very much alive. You can't bury human nature. It is like Banquo's ghost, "It will not down." It will demand and receive stimulus and relaxation. It will not be coerced or advised or starved into goodness. Nor can it be made over into something refined and nice. Men have always insisted on play, and some of their pleasure has been found in that passing social institution, the saloon, which has abounded in light, conversation, warmth and independence.

Now that this gathering-place has pronounced its "morituri salutamus" it is the part of wisdom to begin immediately the use of other forms of amusement which satisfy elemental cravings. History has taught for ages that the removal of one form o temptation did not mean freedom from all temptation. Human nature, like the atmosphere, abhors a vacuum, and straightway finds or invents a substitute.

This truism means that something equally powerful, independent and attractive must be found. Some one amusement or series of pleasures must exist which will absorb the leisure time, the dull periods, the excess energies, the longings for thrill and excitement, or the demands of weary or overburdened minds. I wonder how energetically the opponents of the saloon have labored to find these legitimate outlets for human energy? Are they leaving this constructive social problem to individual ingenuity or to proprietors of coffee houses, clubs and "subway saloons"?

The business men are awake and active. All their energies have been applied to producing commercial pleasure which will have a sufficiently broad appeal to make a continuous profit for themselves.

Human nature, however, is continually demanding more and something different. The motion picture serves more people than any of the others. It has something for every one. Its appeal is universal. It furnishes emotional excitement, mental stimulus, and a contrast to drab realities. It draws all members of a family instead of age or sex groups alone. It is a democratic, wholesome and self-respecting entertainment. Again, it is inexpensive, near at hand and ever-changing.

Always the Saloon's Rival

By S. L. ROTHAPFEL
Formerly of Rialto and Rivoli Theaters, New York

IT HAS been true always that the motion picture has been the great foe of the saloon. This has been particularly noticeable in small towns, where, prior to the inauguration of the movie theater, there was not much to do for entertainment, and the saloon had things pretty much its own way. With the coming of the motion picture, which offers clean and wholesome amusement to the whole family for the price of a man's evening drinks, many men have been quick to choose the better entertainment, and to take their families along. That being true, too—movie theater and saloon have been rivals, with the theater getting the best of it generally; but with the elimination of the saloon the theater is left in complete possession of the field. Motion-picture theaters are exceedingly prosperous in prohibition territory.

The New Loan for World Liberty

WHY should we wish to deceive ourselves? There is only one way out of the hideous mess into which the insanity of rulers has plunged the nations of the world. The way Out is the way Through! We cannot draw back. To the cause which we have embraced the United States has given the lives of its young men, and pledged the nation's sacred honor. Over the top—and beyond, is the shining path of peace.

So, in this Victory Loan campaign about to open we consecrate ourselves to new and holier fidelities. Faith without works is dead. We had to end this war, and end it quickly. We can only complete the victory by securing permanent peace and justice. Our sons have paid with their blood; it is little for us to do that we should pay with our gold. Wherefore: Buy Victory Liberty Bonds!

There are hurts which are beyond the reach of medicine. Diseases desperate grown—by desperate appliances are relieved, or not at all. The surgeon comes—and his knife. He pierces, cuts, and we shudder at his work. Destroys? No; for he, too, is a repairer, the heroic healer; and his work is beneficence. The disease of the world was incurable by any drug in the pharmacopœia of European statesmanship. It was time for the knife.

Our worst imagination of hell pales before the frightful realities of Belgium and Serbia, Poland and Armenia, and the provinces of northern France. Seven millions of men have been slaughtered by machinery, and twenty-five millions more have been lamed or maimed or blinded or injured in some way. And the orgie of blood and lust goes on.

These thirty millions and more were in the ranks of the fighters. What of the suffering civilian population? There is now in this country a physician lately home from his work as a medical missionary in the lands beneath the shadow of Ararat. When he attends a public meeting he exhibits a human skull. He says: "This is an Armenian skull. It is one of eight hundred thousand Armenian skulls which line the desert way, from the Black Sea to the Persian Gulf." His witness is true. But among the eight hundred thousand Armenians whose bones are whitening in the sands of the desert are the supremely lucky ones. Death met them, and they died. More than a million human beings, mainly women and children, have within the last four years been done to death amid agonies of nameless outrage, and sold openly in the slave markets of Asiatic Turkey.

France Needs Homes

FRANCE has lost homes. Across five fair provinces lies a trail of ruin and burnings and devastation so black that a great French engineer has said, "In parts of my country we can only plant pine trees, and wait a hundred years."

He was wrong. That is not the spirit of France. In 1916, long before the enemy was hurled back, before the end was in sight, France had begun to plan for her reconstruction. And the one plea of the men who are undertaking the guidance and direction of her rebuilding is this: Homes cannot be replaced by mere houses. For France, more than any other, is the home land, and if she is to be given back, even in small part, the beauty and the homeliness that were hers, the replacement of her shattered homes must be done tenderly.

But France must have money. Eight billions of dollars, forty billions of francs, will be needed to repair her wounds, and France is poor—in money.

Belgium Needs Machinery

WHEN, in October of 1917, Belgium formed a National Board of Trade to begin to estimate her reconstruction needs, this board announced that beyond and above and before anything else, except food and clothing to maintain life, their country needed new stocks of machinery and tools and raw materials. Her industries have been blotted out.

And Belgium will have to be supplied with the means of industry, which is machinery and machine tools for its making.

The United States must supply her, for we have not only led the world in the manufacture of these things, but we alone are at present equipped to export them in great numbers.

Belgium cannot wait, for her life will recommence only with the taking up of her trades and industries. She must have everything mechanical, from giant lathes for her score of great locomotive works, with heavy slotting-machines, wheel-turning lathes and boring machinery, to the light machine tools; planes, drills, grinding and shaping machines, milling and threading machines, gear-cutters, saws, lathes, specialties for pressed and drawn steel work, and a hundred more. These she will want not by the hundred, but by the thousand; for Belgium must begin again at the very beginning.

Serbia Needs Everything

BELGRADE, Monastir, Nish, Prizzen, towns and cities, were looted to the last movable object. Even tombstones were ripped up and sold by the Bulgars, and at Prishtina the Germans took the beds from the hospital, turning out the sick and dying. At Vrntsi they seized all the food except one-half pound of flour per person! Less than one loaf of bread to live on for an indefinite period!

The war against Serbia was a war of extermination, nothing else. The Germans, the Turks, and then the traitor Bulgars, set out to wipe them from the face of the earth. The Austrians, because many of them are Slavs and wore the Austrian uniform only because they had to, and because many of them were fathers or brothers of the Serbs, gave way to less ferocity in the field.

Already Serbia is tabulating her needs, and because she has been so completely robbed they will be great. The replacement of her agricultural equipment alone will mount into several hundreds of millions, and with this she will want many other things.

Serbia is on the threshold of a new era, and her development will depend in no small degree upon our aid.

The Gift from Bunny

THEY used to tell me, a long while ago, that if I was a very good little girl, the Easter Bunny would bring gifts to me on Easter Day. And sure enough (for with that promise in mind I tried very hard to be a good little girl) I always found a present from the Easter Bunny on Easter morning.

Sometimes it would be a nest of gayly colored candy eggs that I found, or a basket of quaint little springtime toys, or a tall white lily plant wrapped in frilly, green paper. Sometimes it would be all three of these things at once.

And so it isn't surprising that I grew to regard the Easter Bunny in the light of a near Santa Claus. It isn't any wonder that I thought of him as a little changeling cousin to the fairy folk, a little changeling cousin who went about happily on his four furry legs and did kind things for small children.

And then there came an Easter time when somebody told me that there wasn't any Easter Bunny. And when the next Easter time came round I didn't expect any visit from him. And yet when I woke up in the morning, I found a basket waiting for me, and a particularly tall lily plant, and many candy eggs.

And so I reasoned it out, as clearly as a little girl is ever able to reason things out. And I came to the conclusion that perhaps, after all, it didn't much matter whether there was a real, furry bunny to bring me gifts, just so long as there were gifts, and as long as there was some person who was willing to make believe that he was an Easter Bunny for the sake of bringing those gifts to me.

And that is the answer to it all. As long as people have enough love in their hearts and enough imagination in their minds to play the game of childhood in the way that gives the most pleasure to childhood—why, that game is real! M. E. S.

Things Easy to Make

By MRS. LOUISE H. PECK

THE following suggestions are for children of all ages, from four-year-olds to grown-ups, and it is lots more fun when different ages work together. For our fun we need only flour or prepared paste, and the newspapers which have been folded carefully away, waiting for us all this long time.

Chains: Cut the white margins from several newspapers, very straight and all the same width. Then cut these in strips five inches long, all exactly the same length and with ends cut straight. Take one strip, and paste ends evenly together to form a ring, holding for a moment until the paste catches. Slip another strip through this ring, paste the ends as before, and now we have two rings, one linked within the other. Go on in this way until a long chain has been made. Sometimes brown wrapping-paper strips may be alternated with the white newspaper strips. Later, make chains that will teach numbers: one brown, one white, two brown, one white; three brown, two white; using all kinds of combinations. Don't cut the strips for the children. The preparation of their own material is a wonderful part of the lesson. When several long chains have been made, they may be swung to music or singing, or used as a jumping rope, swung back and forth slowly but not over the head.

Pussy Chains: These are also made from evenly cut margins, and in as long strips as possible. Lay the ends of two strips across each other at right angles, and paste together. Fold the under strip over across the pasted end of the upper strip, but do not paste. Keep on folding one strip over the other at exact right angles until they are used up. Paste on other strips to make the chain longer, and paste ends together to finish.

These chains are pretty made of two colors, and may be used as Easter decorations or as a rope for jumping or to hang on the wall.

Paper Sticks.—Now let us make some paper sticks for laying patterns or pictures on the table as we would with toothpicks. Cut a strip from the white margin or from the printed paper, half an inch wide and twelve inches long. Dip one corner of one end in water and begin to roll tightly at a slant. Keep on rolling tightly, holding the tip with the right hand while the left holds and rolls the strip. When completely rolled into a paper stick of five or six inches, hold firmly and fold over the end. No paste is needed. This makes the old-fashioned lamp-lighter or spill. Illustrated newspaper sheets make pretty variegated sticks.

When fifty or more of these sticks have been made, use them for laying pictures of houses, trees, fences and other objects. Sometimes we bend the sticks for roofs, curves and corners. If the child wishes to keep a picture, have him make a penciled drawing of it in a scrapbook prepared of smooth wrapping paper. All kinds of geometric figures may be made with paper sticks: oblongs, squares, circles, triangles and so on.

The Ducks and the Spoons

An Indian Legend by GREY WOLF

THERE was a grand party given by the Geese to celebrate the marriage of their chief and his bride. All the animals and birds were invited. Coyote was invited too. He paddled to the place of the party in a white canoe with red paddles. Many of his friends came with him in the canoe. Beaver, Muskrat, Otter, Mink, Gray Squirrel, Jack Rabbit, Fox, Badger, Wolverene were all with him in his canoe. When they arrived the fun had begun. Everybody was very happy.

Old enmities were forgotten. Fox shared his food with Rabbit, Weasel and Mouse strolled about together. The gaiety went on till late. A great white moon rose over the river, and still, down there on the level place between the oakwoods and the water, a thousand happy creatures forgot yesterday and tomorrow.

Towards dawn the party began to break up. The more timid ones began to go away first, saying they had babies at home to be fed. Coyote helped Wild Goose to say good-by to those who went. Sometimes he went a little way with ones he liked very much. At dawn the Ducks went off swimming.

Suddenly Wild Goose cried, "The spoons! the spoons are gone!" Then somebody said "The Ducks took them." Coyote went to the edge of the water and called out, "Ducks, did you take the spoons?"

And saucily the answer came back: "Yes, and we will keep them."

For a moment there was silence. Then Coyote cried out, "Yes, you will keep them forever—on your face. You will always be Spoonbill Ducks."

The Cure of Dumps

By CAROLYN SHERWIN BAILEY

ONCE upon a time there was a queer little elf named Dumps, who lived all by himself in a dark little house down in a valley. Ever since he could remember, things had gone wrong with him.

He shivered in the cold and kicked the coal bucket when the fire wouldn't burn. He howled when he stumbled over his own dinner pots that he had left sitting in the middle of the floor, and he stood in his front door and scowled when the other happy elves went by without speaking to him.

He and his family had lived like that for years. When any elf wanted to describe something very sad he would say it was "Down in the Dumps," and so Dumps went on without a single happy day.

But the elves decided, suddenly, to give a party. Oh, it was going to be a very jolly party indeed, and Dumps heard about it. Almost every elf who passed was whistling, or singing something cheerful. And some of them were carrying their best green suits to the Wood Fairy's house to be pressed. And when Dumps heard about the party, he cried so loudly because he knew that he wouldn't be invited that the Wood Fairy heard him. The noise disturbed her so much that she went right down to Dumps's house to see what was the matter with him now.

"Tell me all about it from the beginning, my dear," she asked poor little Dumps.

"I can't see the sunshine!" Dumps howled.

"Of course you can't," said the Wood Fairy. "Your windows are dirty. Get some nice spring water in your little pail and wash them."

Dumps had never thought of doing that. When he washed the windows the sunbeams streamed in like a golden ladder.

"Is there something else the matter?" the Wood Fairy asked.

"My fire won't burn, even though I kick the coal bucket every day," Dumps sobbed.

"Well, do try blowing the fire," the Wood Fairy suggested.

Dumps had never thought of doing that. His bellows were stiff, but he blew them very hard, and, crackle, there was a nice bright fire and his tea kettle began to sing.

"Is that all?" asked the Wood Fairy.

"Oh, no!" Dumps sighed, "The other elves are giving a party and I am not invited."

"It is for all the elves, and you don't have to be invited," the Wood Fairy said. "Stand up straight and let me brush your suit. Now run along, my dear."

So Dumps started up the hill to the party, laughing all the way, for he just couldn't stop. You see, he had so many years of being one of the Dumps to make up for. He laughed until all his wrinkles were gone and he was puffed out with happiness. He started bees buzzing and grasshoppers fiddling and crickets chirping, and a whole crowd of yellow butterflies flew along with him.

"Who can this new, fat, cheerful elf be?" asked all the other elves as Dumps arrived at the party, turning a double somersault into their midst. "We are all here except Dumps, and of course this isn't he?"

Then Dumps showed them how he could turn back somersaults and make a see-saw out of a rush leaf. He taught them how to play baseball with white clover heads, and how to make a swing of braided grasses. He surprised himself with all the good time he was able to think up.

"Of course this isn't Dumps," the other elves decided. "His name must be Delight." And Dumps never told them their mistake; for it wasn't really a mistake at all. Now, was it?

Stepping-Stones

Half sheets of paper placed on the floor, a long step apart, make good stepping-stones over a running brook, the floor being the "water." Care must be taken to step straight and squarely on the paper to avoid slipping. The game is a fine one for developing quick balance. Sometimes play "Eliza crossing the ice," with the dolls held tightly in your arms.

THE ONE HISTORY THAT WILL SATISFY THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

Introduction by GENERAL PEYTON C. MARCH, Chief of Staff, U. S. A.

This is a complete history of the World War written for the American people frankly from the American point of view—A history of the world-convulsing struggle that grips the reader's interest from the very first paragraph, and that carries him with riveted attention through every stage and phase of the titanic conflict in language so clear and vivid that underneath the mighty facts are plainly felt the throb of the passions, the quiver of the hopes, the tense anxieties, the haunting fears of the peoples involved, as the tide of battle ebbs and flows—A history of war, devastation and ultimate victory written by men who know the great heart of humanity, how it loves stories of personal heroism, of bold adventures, of doughboy pluck, that make the real facts of this war more thrilling than fiction ever could be—A history of the most momentous event since that described in the Story of Creation, in which nothing has been omitted to safeguard accuracy of statement.

This briefly summarizes a few of the many interesting and valuable features of the Complete History of the World War by Prof. Francis A. March, scholar and teacher of international repute, and Richard J. Beamish, brilliant war correspondent and military critic—features which place this work beyond competition as a popular and authentic history of over four years of agony, bloodshed and destruction unparalleled in the annals of man.

EVERY BATTLE FRONT AND EVERY COUNTRY INVOLVED

is covered by this lucid, compelling narrative. The vast panorama of War these volumes unfold includes China and Japan, South Africa, Russia and Siberia, Poland, Austria-Hungary and the Balkans, Turkey, Mesopotamia—the cradle of the Human Race—and the Holy Land, where the prowess of English arms under Allenby realized the pious dreams of the Crusaders who eight centuries ago followed Richard, the Lion-Hearted, to wrest the Holy Sepulchre from the hands of the Infidel.

We read with amazement, and deeper appreciation, of Canada's Herculean Part in the War, of her huge contributions of men and munitions, of her heavy casualties. We see England's Colonies in every quarter of the globe loyally rushing to her support to crush the monstrous iniquities of the German Empire. And of Italy's terrific drive, that hurled the throne of the Hapsburgs crashing to the dust, we have an account that reads like a Homeric epic.

GENERAL MARCH, Chief of Staff, the highest officer in the United States Army, has written the Introduction. A history of the World War approved by so high an authority needs no other endorsement to recommend it to the confidence of the American reading public, the heroic deeds of whose gallant sons have been immortalized in so many of its pages.

The Glorious Achievements of the American Army and Navy

How the coup-de-grâce to the ambitious scheme for world domination of the Kaiser, Ludendorf and von Hindenburg was delivered by Americans co-operating with the Allies is told as never before in this History of the World War.

The story of the complete defeat of the Prussian Guard and other crack German regiments by the untried soldiers of America at Chateau-Thierry is one of the most thrilling in American annals.

Pour Havoline Oil in your truck, tractor or motor car. It will not break under heat.

The End and the Road to It

SUNDAY, Mark 10:38. "Ye know not what ye ask." It seemed to James and John a very natural request to make of the Lord that they should sit, one on his right hand, and the other on his left, in his kingdom. It could be as readily granted as it was easily asked! It was simply a distribution of honors. It was like asking the prime minister of our day for some exalted place in his government! Ah, no; it was entirely unlike that. Governmental honors may be party perquisites and nothing more. They may be worn by the unfit and the unworthy. But the honors of the Kingdom of Christ are the inheritance of those who have the character to possess them. We enter into them by a prepared life, just as a disciplined eye enters into the kingdom of color, or a disciplined ear enters into the kingdom of sound. How could we give the glories of art to an inartistic spirit? How could we present the glories of music to an unmusical soul? How can the honors of the Kingdom of God be granted to those who lack the large capacity of divine communion?

"Ye know not what ye ask!" I think our Lord meant that the disciples had no idea what their request implied. They did not realize the discipline and the chastening that would be needed before their character would be able to receive these honors as a natural inheritance. They did not foresee the kind of road they would have to travel in order to reach the desired goal. They were asking for divine honors, but these honors are the crowns of life, and the life has to be made ready before the crowns can be worn. There was a cup to be drunk before the palm could be won. "Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of?" There are glories which only break upon the souls that have been refined by suffering, and without the suffering the glories will never be known. That is to say, we enter into the partnership of the crown by the fellowship of the Cross. J. H. J.

Creator, Revealer, Regenerator

MONDAY, Ps. 19:1, 14. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork." "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my Strength, and my Redeemer." God's world and God's Word are only different parts of God's one revelation. There is no contradiction between natural and revealed religion, when both are properly understood. Genesis and geology speak the same language. There may be contradictions between our interpretations of Genesis and of geology, but there are no contradictions between God's revelations in Genesis and geology. Natural religion is revealed religion, so far as it goes. Natural religion is supplemented by God's fuller, humaner, and diviner revelation contained in the blessed Book which we call the Bible.

The Nineteenth Psalm sets forth most beautifully the true relation which exists between God's world and God's Word. In the first six verses of that psalm we have natural religion. We have here one of the finest personifications I know of in any literature. One day is calling to the next day, and the next takes up the cry and passes it on; thus day unto day, in ceaseless procession, shows God's wondrous revelation of himself. The same thing is true of the nights. In the seventh verse we enter a new atmosphere. We are now breathing the air more distinctively of heaven; our feet are on the eternal rock. We now read, "The law of the Lord is perfect, restoring the soul." Not a word is said in depreciation of natural religion; we simply rise to a higher plane. Down to the end of the thirteenth verse we have revealed ligion, and the effect which it ough produce on conduct and chara Then in the last verse we have ex mental religion: "Let the words of mouth, and so forth." Observe progress we have made in our stud this psalm. We have first, creat second, revelation; third, regenera —natural religion, revealed relig experimental religion. In this resp this psalm is an epitome of the wl Bible. The Bible is the most wonde library in the world. It took 1, years to make it. It took God Almig and probably forty human writers produce it. Some of these writers w princes, some were peasants; some w lovers of war, some preservers of pea Parts of it were written in prisons; pa in palaces; parts by men of cultu parts by men of ordinary intellect. the Book is a unit. The whole Bi centers around Christ. From the fi majestic words of Genesis to the l love-notes of Revelation, this Bo reveals Christ's glory and chants praise. R. S. M.

The Greatest Test

TUESDAY, Mark 10:21. "One thi thou lackest." The minister p this question to his congregation o Sunday, and asked the people to answ by sending him their replies on po cards:

"What is the greatest test of a Chri tian life that you know?"

Among the answers were these:

"The greatest test is to love one enemies."

"The greatest test is to lose mone for the sake of a principle."

"The greatest test is to stand alon for a great but unpopular cause."

"The test by which I judge the Chris tian life is the absence of race prejudic and a love of the masses."

"The greatest test is calmness o spirit under great and undeserved prov ocation."

"The greatest test is living in th right proportion; putting money-mak ing, pleasure-seeking and earthly ambi tion where they belong and making th kingdom of God first."

One young man waited after the congregation had gone out, and spoke the minister:

"I did not hear my answer in those you read out this morning. For me the only test of a Christian life is the over whelming desire to bring the world my Master. How can I do that? I am not asking for any one else, only for myself. How can I do that?"

"There is only one answer to that. The entire consecration of all you have and are, the lending of all your gifts and talents to God. The supreme test of a Christian is 'Consecration.' That is the one thing that very many church members and nominal Christians lack."

That young man came to the minister a few weeks later and asked to be enrolled in the ranks of the student volunteer band. That was his answer to the question. That was his summing up of the test required. What is yours?

The Gospel of Comfort

WEDNESDAY. II Cor. 1:3. "The Father of mercies and the God of all comfort." The word "comfort" means "to call to one's side." It suggests the hoisting of the signal and the appeal for help. When the answer comes the ministry of comfort is revealed. The great answerer of our signals is God. He is the great Comforter. His presence makes all the difference. He does not argue nor explain. He stands at our side until the morning.

In the British base camps along the Flanders front one found the little hospitality huts where Christian women ited upon the friends of the sick and ffering and dying soldier lads. On a ment's notice love had answered the nals of suffering. The friends who d come, carried a little slip of yellow per, a telegram from one of the offi- rs of the camp who had waited and tched and at last had sent the dis- tch. The message said, "Come." hat was all. That telegram was pass- rt, railway ticket, bus fare, Channel ossing, entrance to the war zone, a at on the troop train, official pass into e long low hospital where the lad had gnaled in his loneliness. Just a tele- am! No red-tape, no bewildering ficials, no hours of waiting, no compli- tions, no questions.

Can we think less of God?. He com- rteth us as a mother comforteth her ild, and he comes ten thousand leagues answer to the signal which faith sends ut in the hour of its necessity. This is he marvelous message of the Gospel. t does not promise us happiness. It ven says that in the world we shall ave tribulation. It does not even romise peace, for it tells us of the com- ng of One who came not to send peace n the earth, but a sword. It does not romise joy, for it says of the mother of ur Lord that a sword shall pierce her oul. But it does promise strength and ourage and comfort. H. T. K.

Doing the Best We Can

THURSDAY. Acts 4:14. "And beholding the man which was healed standing with them, they could say nothing against it." When Peter and John were arrested for healing the lame man at the gate of the temple the authorities seeing the healed man standing in the court with the accused were forced to suspend judgment. There was nothing they could say or do. The tree was vindicated by its fruit. Christianity is not judged by what it says but by that which it does. Peter preached a great sermon and told all about the power of Jesus Christ. But the greater sermon was the evidence in concrete form of that power, "Many that heard the Word believed, and the number was about five thousand." So runs the account. It could be written, "Many that saw believed." The healed man was the flesh-and-blood sermon, the "living epistle." The God that answers by healed humanity, by missions, by hospitals, by colleges and by libraries, he is God indeed. But the healed man—what did he do? Not very much, perhaps. He stood with the apostles. But that was sufficient. He did what he could. Angels can do no more. Christian service is not a matter of dimension. It is fidelity to the duty next at hand. It is being faithful in little things. It is coupling our best with our sincerity. John Smith's best may not be Tom Jones's best, but it is John Smith's best, and God will bless it. John Smith plus God are a majority. When we are on God's side then God is on our side. John Wesley said, "The best of all is, God is with us. That was because John Wesley was with God."

Do the best you can. Jesus had great regard for the woman who did what she could. If converts would only stand with the disciples, the apostles, the preachers! Seeing them thus stand the result will be a convinced world. R. B.

Compound Retribution

FRIDAY. Luke 11:49, 50. "Therefore also said the wisdom of God, I will send them prophets and apostles, and some of them they shall slay and persecute: that the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world, may be required of this generation." God in his inscrutable counsels often defers the final punishment of a wicked race for many hundreds of years. He continues pleading with a nation of evildoers through his appointed messengers in order to make them see their iniquity. Meanwhile the nation proceeds in its evil career and becomes hardened in iniquity, until they commit a crime so appalling as that of the murder of the Prince of life, and become revealed as reprobates. The fate which the Son of God and his earliest Christian witnesses met with at the hands of the Jews was the culminating abomination of the race. The long stream of blood innocently shed, which runs through their history, broadening and deepening as it proceeds, finally surges around the cross on Calvary, where the Grand Ambassador of the merciful God mingles his own blood with the blood of all the ancient martyrs from Abel down to Zacharias. It is, indeed, a mark of the solemn earnestness of God's retributive justice that when at last he sets out to visit its sins upon a generation that has been reared in wickedness his retribution becomes, as it were, compound: "when a generation concurs in heart with the wickedness of an earlier generation, it receives in the final retribution of the accumulated guilt, as well the punishment for its own, as for the former sins which it had made its own."

We gather, however, from this episode a higher lesson still: we remember that the speaker is the Lamb of God who has come to take away the sins of the world. That mission includes his own sacrifice. He spoke the words of our text with the clear view of his ignominious death before him. Mournful as the prospect of Golgotha was, it did not deter him a moment from the pursuit of his mission of love. Even the severe words which he has to speak to these particular people as the teacher of impartial truth are meant for men's good. W. H. T. D.

Humility the Eye-Opener

SATURDAY. Phil. 2:3. "Let each esteem other better than themselves." The egotistical mind doubts all but its own assumed superiority. "Is it true, John, that you think that you and your brother Sandy are the only real believers in all Scotland?" "Ay, an' I begin to hae my doots about Sandy." How narrow and self-confident some people are! Would that their eyes could be opened to behold the wider horizon of God's love and mercy that endureth forever and is like the wideness of the sea! Humility of soul clears the atmosphere that we may see good in others instead of thinking we only are left of the Father's faithful followers.

The spirit of honoring one another often entertains angels unawares, and at least gives happiness to those in whom we repose such implicit confidence. Esteeming others better than yourself puts the heart in an attitude of worship and praise to the heavenly Father. Continuous criticism prevents thanksgiving to God and is liable to unite such persons into a kind of mutual admiration society for themselves alone.

Thomas à Kempis says, "Whoso knoweth himself well groweth more mean in his own conceit and delighteth not in the praise of men. Vanity, the opposite of humility, goes strutting through the world seeking honor from men and forgetting God. What a contrast the humble Christian presents, hidden away in the secret presence of the Almighty!

Ruth, esteeming Naomi better than herself, refused to part from her, saying, "Thy God shall be my God." Seeing good in others and following them as they follow Christ, we become like Him under whose shadow we abide. Humanity desires ever to behold love incarnated in human action, walking Bibles, who are sent through the world after Christ's ascension into heaven. They are miniature redeemers, representatives and faithful ambassadors, seeking to reconcile lost men to God. E. W. C.

The Holy Spirit Our Helper

International Sunday School Lesson for April 27
John 16:7-15, Acts 2:1-8, 14-18

The Indwelling God

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

GOD has a threefold self-manifestation in the New Testament, and from the early times Christians have found three ways of thinking about God. So in our present series of lessons we have thought of him as the Creator and All-Father in the first lesson, as the Self-Revealer who makes himself known to men supremely in Jesus Christ in our second and third lessons, and now we consider him as the Self-Imparter who is the Helper and Guide of every receptive human spirit even today. Some one has well said we have a God whom we can worship—the Father; and a God whom we can know—His Only Son Our Lord; and a God who will admit us into his fellowship—the Holy Spirit. Yet these three are one, the God of the Universe manifested in all his manifold wisdom and love.

How all-important is the belief in a God who is present today! Not one who spake only unto godly men of old, but who speaks to godly men all around us. Not one who was merely interested in ancient Jewish history, but one who is vitally interested in Belgium and France and America of the present and of the days to come! Not simply one who gave a refuge and a help to the stricken psalmist, but who has drawn pæans of grateful praise from many a Fanny Crosby and an occasional Whittier in our own times. Best of all, how glorious it is to know from personal experience that God is and that he is a rewarder of them that seek Him.

The Promise of the Spirit

Our first reading, John 16, brings us Christ's assurance of the coming of the Spirit. How gracious and thoughtful are his words in the midst of his farewell, knowing better than they themselves the sense of loss and fear which his departure from their sight should cause. He anticipates their need with the explicit assurance that they will not be left comfortless, alone and friendless. The Unseen Guide will come, he who is truly Christ himself within his disciples. When the Holy Spirit moves upon our hearts we rightly say we have been with Jesus and felt the breath of his love.

That promise is for us all. It brings with it what Paul calls "the fruits of the Spirit," which are the same in his letter to the Galatians from experience as Christ's prediction is here. Read them (Gal. 5:22), "love, joy peace," and the others, noticing here in the Discourse of the Upper Room the same qualities of the Indwelling Christ—"continue ye in my love," "that my joy might be in you" and "my peace I give unto you." Yet just as Paul found some people who considered themselves believers who "had not received the Holy Spirit," so verily there seem today to be many who have not felt the ministrations of the Indwelling God. Surely the defect is in our attitude, our consecration. Let us ask ourselves, "Have we received the Holy Spirit?" lest we miss the characteristic joy of the spirit-guided life.

The Day of Pentecost

Our second reading tells the ever-fruitful story of the first great spiritual forward movement of the Christian Church. The Holy Spirit descended in mighty power upon the entire Christian fellowship and tremendous results accrued for the redemption of souls. Naturally we in our local churches long for a spirit-empowered confraternity that might be similarly effective in spreading God's Word and his kingdom. We wish for the time when "the whole multitude of them that believe," so much more numerous now than then, might be equally inspired and powerful. Therefore it is for us to study again and again the conditions of the time when God fulfilled the prophecy of Joel and poured out his Spirit in full measure. For the prophecy is of perennial promise and application, and has been fulfilled many times in the history of Christian missions, since that day.

How well we remember that at Pentecost the Church answered Christ's prayer for unity of spirit! "They were all of one accord in one place!" Later it is written: "Of one heart and one soul and not one of them said that aught of the things which he possessed was his own." Complete unity of spirit and utter unselfishness and consecration! No wonder God could enter in and manifest himself through them. How far does your congregation manifest such a preparation for a new Pentecost?

The Pentecost of the Modern Church waits upon two things, it seems to me—a larger unity and a deeper consecration. For these two considerations the Christian Herald stands unswervingly. Let us remember the marvelous effectiveness which Jesus saw in spiritual unity—"that they be one, that the world may know that thou didst send me." Such a unity is only possible with a constraining love that will cast out all selfishness, all covetousness and all resentments. When the love of Christ constrains us to the elimi of other interests we shall hav great revival in the local churcl when that love constrains the Chi sects there will be a new World Re
We are trying to make way fo Holy Ghost to use the Church of in new and glorious power.

The Spirit and the Individual Belie

That greatly to be desired end is possible as individual men and w in increasing numbers yield thems to the Spirit of God. Just as "cannot have a saved community out saved individuals," you cannot a Spirit-filled Christendom wit Spirit-filled Christians. These can t form the whole situation, from ch to church around the earth. Ther we must develop the life of prayer faith in ourselves first of all. We open up our own souls to that S who will guide us into all truth. T we and our fellow workers will more and more teachable, so that can take of the things of Jesus show them unto us. As we learn fully of the will of our Lord, and his righteous purposes, he will tel more of those things which he "c not tell" his disciples because they c not bear them then. There are th he would fain speak to us now, but cannot bear them, nor shall we be until we put all that we are and that we have at the Spirit's dispo calling nothing our own.

The Holy Spirit our Helper alone sustain us in the trials and temptati of everyday life. The Spirit of alone can set us free from the law of and death. It is the Spirit that gi us the joy of sonship whereby we "Abba, Father." "For as many as led by the Spirit of God, these are s of God." Finally the Spirit is the t of discipleship to Jesus—"If any m have not the Spirit of Christ he none of His."

The Spirit of Christ! That Spi manifest everywhere would make heav on earth. Let us see to it that grieve not the Holy Spirit of God.

The Pastor and the Bible

I HAVE been very interested in your plea for a League of Churches. My good wife and I have made that our prayer for years. When we came into this town of 6,000, we went from church to church, and had it not been for the name on the door, we could not have told from the preaching what faith was followed, except they were all followers of Christ.

Our town is a factory town, but I saw few of the factory workers at church. The churches seemed to be all striving for the same class of people and leaving out the others. There were but few people at any of the services.

I am sure that had the combined salaries been used to pay an experienced preacher, a Bible secretary and a social secretary there would have been much progress shown. I mean, get a man preeminently a preacher and pay him what he is worth, and let him care for the preaching services. Have a man who is preeminently a Bible teacher and let him look after the Bible school, and conduct Bible classes during the week. Every class of people would be interested in Bible study if it were taught as Dr. Wilbert W. White teaches it in the Bible Teachers' Training School. He teaches the Bible instead of explaining it; for the Bible will explain itself, and he has wonderful ability in making Bible teachers. The Bible secretary should have an assistant who should be preeminently a Bible student, but also have the happy faculty of being an entertainer. With such a personnel to guide the religious and social life of the church and community, the church would then be open every day of the week and there would be various Bible classes taking up the study of the books of the Bible.

I am sure the day has passed when people will sit regularly and listen to an ordinary speaker talk on his views about the Bible. He must know the Bible and be able to preach the Bible. I believe the theological schools should change the methods and instead of making general ministers they should specialize. Those who are gifted to preach should be given special training, while those gifted in teaching should be led in that line. It is the branch that is not bringing forth fruit. Our church boards should form a board with all working together under one head; thus much duplication would be eliminated.

I am sure the heads of the churches must make the move before it can be carried through in the small churches.

Roy A. Prudden.

To Make Employment. Failure of Congress to appropriate money for railroad improvements, which had been expected to furnish employment for thousands of returning soldiers, resulted in the turning of the Government influence toward encouragement of private building. Material manufacturers are to be asked to start production, banks are to be urged to adopt a liberal attitude toward the building loans, prices are to be stabilized at a lower scale and transportation facilitated.

Happiness at Home

iciency Through Daintiness

By Laura A. Kirkman

ORE and more, housekeepers are beginning to acknowledge the restorative power in daintiness. me was when the housekeeper- ier sought only to give her young hter a dainty bedroom and be- ng apparel; today she realizes that ierself must have these things, in a ure, if she would give her best ts to her family.

r, much of the housekeeper's work ists in conquering dust and dirt, at the end of the daily battle she s the healing effect of a dainty bed- to which to retire, and a pretty ono to slip on if she cares to "putter nd" for a while before going to bed.

don't know why it is," I once d a busy housekeeper say, "but ing rests me like getting into a silk ono at the end of a hard day; some- that kimono seems to make me for- he day's work—it sort of gives me a ge."

ainty surroundings in the bedroom this same effect—give the taut- ng nerves the sense of luxury which seem to need.

But I can't afford dainty things," e women would protest if con- ted with this argument. Yet this t true of the simple things to which fer; any woman can have them.

or instance, any woman can have a kimono by making one out of an silk dress or even out of a worn-out curtain. Such a garment may be d any desired color.

ny woman may also have a dainty room if she will buy a few yards of onne and make valances to fall over white curtains at her windows. Cre- nes are reasonable, and valances of material form the major difference ween an attractive and an unattrac- bedroom. The lesser points of tiness—fine, crisp-white bureau and le covers, a dainty lamp shade, etc.— y be made from odds and ends of ma- al on hand.

es, if the housekeeper wills, she may e these inexpensive yet, to her, valu- possessions—valuable because they et the strain of her work and enable to maintain a normal efficiency.

Change in the Dinner Fare

HE wise housekeeper knows that now and then her family tires of the inary ways in which food is prepared, would welcome a change in fare. e following menu will help the woman o would give her family an out-of- -ordinary yet inexpensive dinner:

Cauliflower Pudding: Boil a large wer in salted water. Make 1 cup ite sauce (same as given above), to ich add 2 tablespoons grated cheese. ke in buttered baking dish in layers sauce and cauliflower. Melt 1 table- oon butter, thicken with fine bread imbs and spread over top. Brown oven.

Do Not Punish in Anger

By Mary E. Dozier

A CHILD of four years who was in the habit of pinching her neighbors, was asked by her kindergarten teacher: "Would you like to have Alice pinch you?" "No." "She doesn't like it either, Dorothy, and will not care to sit by you if you continue."

But the talk did no good, for the little tot went on repeating her offense. Then the teacher quietly took her handkerchief and, wrapping it around the offending member, said: "Suppose we cover up this little hand, and not let it be seen until it can remember not to pinch."

After a few minutes the child came over to the teacher to say that the hand could take care of itself now. Smilingly the teacher unwrapped it and said: "I am so glad!"

A mother, for a similar offense, was seen to slap her child's hand and jerk his arm. Which do you think the better method to follow?

New Rhubarb Recipes

SOON every housewife who has a few rhubarb plants will be cutting the tender new stalks for pies and sauce. Some do not know that there are other ways in which this vegetable may be used. The home economics workers at the New York State College of Agriculture furnish the following recipes:

Rhubarb Shortcake—3 eggs, 3 tablespoonfuls lemon juice, 1 cupful granulated sugar, 1 cupful flour, 1 teaspoonful baking powder, ¼ teaspoonful salt. Beat the yolks of the eggs until they are light. Add the lemon juice, and gradually beat in the sugar. Beat the whites of the eggs until they are dry, add them to the mixture, and beat it well. Sift together the flour, the baking powder, and the salt. Fold the dry ingredients lightly into the egg mixture. Bake the cake in two layers in moderate oven. For the filling, take 2 teaspoonfuls gelatin, ¼ cupful cold water, 1 pint red rhubarb cut in small pieces, 1 cupful sugar, juice and grated rind of ½ orange.

Baked Rhubarb—Cut the rhubarb in small pieces. In a baking dish place a layer of rhubarb, sprinkle it generously with sugar, and alternate in this way until the dish is filled. Sprinkle sugar over the top, add small pieces of butter and grated lemon rind or cinnamon. Bake the dish slowly until it is well done. Long, slow baking gives rhubarb a rich, red color.

Marion Harland's Corner

PERHAPS the Cornerites will like to have one or two Brazilian recipes, to add variety and novelty to their menus, and aid in the conservation of foods. It is well to state in the beginning, however, that it is just as difficult to get accuracy of detail from a Brazilian cook or housewife as from our old-fashioned Southern cooks. It is always, "As much as you want to use," "Enough to make it good," or "According to taste."

Boil "big hominy" or samp until thoroughly tender in water to which a little salt has been added. Then put in sweet milk, sugar to taste, and one or two sticks of cinnamon, if liked, and boil a while longer. A little while before serving, add parched and ground peanuts, or grated cocoanut. Serve hot for dessert.

Boil grated cocoanut in molasses—I should think corn syrup would do just as well—until it is a soft mass when cold. This is a very rich dessert, and only a little should be served to each person.—G. M., Lavras Minas, Brazil.

A package of mending tissue, which can be purchased for a few cents at any notion counter, should find a place in every work basket.

"Then feed my sheep," said Jesus. And then he added words which Peter did not understand until the time came.

"I tell you," Jesus was saying, "that when you were young you used to put on your girdle and walk whichever way you chose to go. But when you are an old man you will stretch out your arms and some one else will put a girdle round you and carry you where you have no wish to go."

Peter looked at John, some faint glimmer of the meaning of this prophecy dawning on him

"And what of John, Master? What about him?"

"What concern is that of yours, Peter? Your business is to follow me."

And these were the words that lingered with Peter until the day when his beloved Master went away in the cloud. How his heart burned within him to begin the task of making disciples? And he turned back with the rest of the disciples into the city, to wait with them for the Spirit's power.

THEN came the day when the Spirit, with the noise of a mighty rushing wind, roared through the upper room as they kneeled in prayer. And then the tongues of flame alighting on the heads of all.

To Peter had come the third testing of fire. The first had been the fire at which he had sat selfishly and fearfully warming himself, where he had denied his Master. The second was the fire the Master had kindled, in front of which he had received the divine commission to make disciples and take care of God's children. And now this third fire of the Spirit, this tongue of flame, which was to transform the ignorant, self-willed, egotistic Peter into a burning evangelist, destined to set the pagan world aflame with Christianity and overthrow the great Roman Empire itself, all because of a risen Redeemer.

For in the enthusiasm of that tongue of flame Peter went out boldly, faced his enemies and preached a sermon that converted more than five thousand persons. On he went, with increasing power, this ignorant workingman who had denied his Lord, traveling over the country, the tongue of flame burning into the pagan world, establishing churches, overturning old heathen customs of centuries, converting multitudes, transforming the Roman Empire with the thrill of a religion that had at the heart of it a pulsing immortality.

Who shall tell the story of that marvelous conquest of the hearts and minds of men? No one has ever fully told it —no one ever will. Through labors unparalleled, with toil and sacrifice immeasurable and with a burning zeal kindled by the three fires of his experience, Peter, transformed himself by the knowledge of a risen Lord, performed his life task, by the magnitude of it dimming and finally, we believe, extinguishing the memory of that denial of his Lord so dear to him.

THE years sped, and Peter was an old man, gray-headed, snow-frosted, but with eye aflash and tongue aflame, as when the tending of the sheep first began. Then one day, victim of jealous hate and persecution, he faced his own crucifixion.

They passed a rope around him and the cross to bind it to him before they lifted it up to set it in its place on the ground.

Ah! Then he knew what the Master had meant, when, that day outdoors by the fire where they had breakfasted together, he had said: "When you are an old man, you will stretch out your arms and some one else will put a girdle about you and carry you where you have no wish to go."

They were lifting up him and the cross together now and beginning to carry the load over to the hole dug for it. Then for one agonizing moment the old fear came over Peter. Although he was an old man he did not want to die. He wanted to feed more of the lambs and tend more of the sheep. He had done so little for his Lord.

Then before they could set the cross in its place, he thought of the Master. He had died this way! What an honor for the disciple to follow his Lord! But he was not worthy to die the same.

From the old man's lips a cry broke on the ears of his astonished executioners:

"Put the cross in the ground downwards! Not as the Master died! I am not worthy! Place it downwards!"

Yielding to his demand, they obeyed. Peter smiled. His fear was gone.

"I shall be with my Master soon!" he said. And those who thrust the cross downwards into the earth said as they noted the smile on Peter's countenance, "These Christians do not die like other men!"

"Whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die," said Peter, and these were the last words he uttered before his spirit met his dear Lord who was waiting at heaven's gate to welcome him into Paradise.

Oh, all ye Peters in the modern church who have denied your Lord, what does the Resurrection mean to you?

You who have warmed yourselves at the fire, what have you ever really done for the Lord you said you loved and promised to obey?

You have joined a church and paid a few cents a week for its support and given for your own selfish amusements ten times as much.

You have faced a world hungering and starving for physical and spiritual food and paid little heed to its agonizing cry.

In a time when war's destruction claims uncounted sums for its share of God's money, what pitiful sums you give and what shameful excuses you make for the lack of means to evangelize the world!

Well may all modern Peters go out and weep bitterly because of their denial of their Lord!

What niggard spending of his wealth! What shameless disobedience of his commands!

Come!

Let us warm ourselves, not at our own selfish fire, but at the one which he himself kindles, around which we hear him say to us, "Feed my lambs. Tend my sheep."

And then, for the power to do this work, let all Peters in the church wait in some upper room, where the noises of the street cannot penetrate, until the Spirit shall come rushing in, and the third fire of flame of tongue to evangelize the world shall come to burn upon the heart the message of a risen Lord to a dying world waiting to be assured of the fact.

The world cannot be saved by a dead Christ. Neither can it be saved by dead Peters in a dead church. Only the risen Christ and an awakened Peter can awake a sleeping world.

The Reform of the Boxers

BANDITS and robbers have been much in evidence in the Shantung mission field, so much so that in portions of the field only about a third of the congregations were available for the services, as the great majority had fled to the walled cities and villages, writes A. A. Fulton from Canton, China.

In Tsining County conditions were better, but highway robbery is a daily occurrence, and men have been carried off for ransom as near as five miles from the city. A station on the railway was attacked by robbers, two guards were killed, and the arms of the remainder secured, only nine miles distant. The reason for the comparative quiet in this section of the county is strangely due to the fact that the "Great Sword Society," the Boxers of 1900, have been reorganized into a very efficient home guard. They have banded together in the southwest countryside and are making life miserable for the bandits. A foreign business man of this city, who was captured in this district and a ransom demanded, was afterward freed by these same old-time Boxers, through their fighting the robbers. Quite a transformation of Boxer tactics since their persecution of foreigners in 1900.

But we must make our believe that notwithstanding ng that may happen, God will s weave through it all a golden which never can be broken. It ot matter whether we understand ys of the universe or not; it does en matter so much whether there iction and sorrow or not, just so s we rest in the goodness and kind- of God and try with him to find ay into usefulness and happiness This is the second princely step d peace.

then Christ lifted the close-drawn hts of those disciples to larger n. Their courage was failing because they were seeking no fur- han very human limitations. But vas a break and a crisis requiring the superhuman. They must look up and away from themselves and their little lives and their little dreams, to the bigness of God's universe. The old fishing-nets are to be left for other hands; and you are to become the fishers of men—and the destiny of humanity awaits your coming!

This is the final princely step to peace. It is to turn to other and less self-centered occupation. It is to develop within us resources that are inexhaustible and equal to every demand. There are other mansions in life than the miniature chamber in which we have been living.

Life has many mansions. And we are unfair to ourselves in that so much of the time we live so contentedly in only one—and that a small and selfish one. It impoverishes us. It makes us puny and irritable with every trial and change.

That one is to be pitied who draws the canopy of earth close down about himself and has no resources in the infinite reaches of God. He lives in a pigmy world who has silenced the cry in his heart for the vaster proportions of immortality. To the great and serene hearts of every age and generation, the spiritual and eternal has been even more real and vital than the material and transient. "If it were not so," Christ said simply, "I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am there ye may be also." A Living Presence will guide us toward those whose love we have cherished all this while. What difference if in these intervening years the road be devious and hard, or if many times we be travel-stained and weary, just so long as our faces are set toward home—there to work and play and rest awhile again with those we have loved and lost?

Help for the Handicapped

The Government Offers Special Training to Crippled Soldiers and Sailors

T as the method of warfare has anged, so, too, has changed the -war care of the handicapped sol- or sailor. Today the government t offering him a pension only, but thing of far more and lasting value opportunity to perfect himself in cialized trade, thereby becoming a l, productive citizen of the coun- e has helped to make safe for this future generations, and for which s made so great a sacrifice.

with both legs and both arms a man t a mediocre workman, earning a which gives him only a hand-to- th existence, and even with both or both arms missing, he is a better man in a specialized trade, earning ge far in excess of that ever earned re, shall we pity him? The man is g more brain and less brawn. Work, panacea of all ills, holds sway over locking the door of his mind against nhappy thoughts and self-pity.

he government and the Red Cross erating with it are offering to every dicapped soldier and sailor training of charge in a carefully selected e. Upon discouragement's argu- t is being brought to bear the kindly pathy, boundless tact and infinite ence of those engaged in this great k of "reeducation," as the French e termed it. When the soldier or or is shown what others handicapped himself or with even greater handi- s have done and are doing, he is used to the possibilities and oppor- ities the future holds in store for , and he realizes that there "are no ples," in the old meaning of the rd, because there are none who are ctive and dependent.

This reeducation in many cases will mean teaching the man to do the same work he did before the war, but in a little different way, using his left hand, perhaps, instead of his right. Or for a man who had no training in any special line (and this applies to many of the younger men who had left school at a very early age), instruction in a specialized trade, which will fit him for a lucrative position. Expert advice is given each man and help in choosing, not perhaps the trade that will in all cases place him most quickly in a position, but a trade for which he is physically fit, and for which he has a natural aptitude.

To the man who has lost a leg or even both legs, mechanical drafting offers good opportunities, considering always the man's own preference, aptitude and past experience. The time required to become a tracer is but a few weeks, and in a few months one may do detailing.

Printing is another trade demanding more skilled workers, especially monotype casters and runners.

With the rapid strides in the motion picture industry it will readily be seen that operators can find and will find increasing opportunities.

Electrical trades, because of their stability and the growing demand for men, rank among the desirable trades, as also does oxy-acetylene welding, which is a comparatively new process.

Carpentering, celluloid work, leather work, the making of artificial limbs, machine tool work, toy-making and piano-making are some of the trades to which particular attention is being given.

Also the government is assuring the returned soldier and sailor preference in civil service positions.

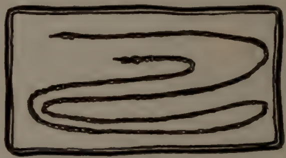
For the Girl Who Can Crochet

By Laura A. Kirkman

CLARA loved to help her mother, so she always stayed in the kitchen on ironing day to put back in the underwear the ribbons which had been taken out before the clothes were washed.

"Why couldn't I crochet some draw-strings for the underwear, so that we need not take the ribbons out every week?" she asked her mother one ironing day.

"That is a very good idea," answered her mother, "but I think it would be best to make them of silkateen rather than of ordinary crochet cotton."



The next day, after school, Cla her workbasket and carried ou idea. She made a draw-string of teen, using the chain stitch, and running the string through a gar finished the two ends by tying kno fraying out the yarn (to form ta

Young People's Topics for April 27

Christianity and the Toilers of the Day

Christian Endeavor Topic. Matthew 9:35-38.

JESUS exemplified in his own life the dignity of honest toil. In all the centuries his Spirit has blessed millions of the toilers of the world. No matter how magnificent the cathedral, how brilliant the array of ecclesiastics, the loyalty and love of the laboring and middle classes have been the real strength of the Church. But because of the glitter of wealth and the lust for power, the Church has somewhat lost the allegiance of those who toil. Many who work for wages believe that the Church has sold her soul to the capitalist class to insure her ease. It is not true. But that feeling must be met and proven false. The Church of today must lead the movements for the betterment of labor, for the improvement of living conditions, for the extension of opportunity, for the spread of education. No one of these is essentially spiritual, but each must proceed from spiritual ideals if it is to proceed safely. If the Church does not lead in these, non-religious social organizations will. If the Church stands aside while others serve, she loses her opportunity and gives point to the criticism of labor leaders. The faith of Christ tends irresistibly toward liberty. The Church must free men, not alone from guilt of sin but from ignorance, from hunger, from dark hovels and filthy alleys, from industrial and political oppression, from every physical, social and mental chain that binds them. Wherever greed, or power, or caste, or circumstance would enslave a toiler the Church must be found championing his cause, sharing his slavery, until it can stand free with him.

Fighting the Drink Foe

B. P. Y. U. Topic. Isaiah 28 : 1-6.

THE demon rum is down in America, but he is not whipped. He is just beginning to fight, and every resource of cunning and craft, of skill and science, will be drawn upon to turn backward the clock of progress. Only the initial battle is won, and every man, woman and child interested in the full achievement of national sobriety must keep on fighting. But the fighting must be fair. Sometimes officers of the law forget the law's limitations and break one law while attempting to enforce another. Search without warrant, arrests without authority, eventuate in disgust with the law. In some states legislatures are apathetic toward proper legislation to enforce the amendment, and lawmakers appear ready to encourage violation of law. We must spur our legislatures to action consonant with the spirit and intent of the amendment, and we must hold back those who disregard all other law in their efforts to make one effective. If we fight hard and fight fair our country will be swept clean of alcoholic beverages, and a year of prohibition, fairly enforced, will so clearly emphasize its merits as to insure ultimate victory over every element that would re the facts.

"Goodness, Daddy! You're Slow—The Car is Already Jacked Up!"

Weed Chain-Jack

It's Child's Play to Operate It

Simply a few easy pulls on its chain lifts or lowers the heaviest car while you stand erect. Up or down—there's no labor.

To operate a Weed Chain-Jack it is not necessary to get down in a cramped, strained position and grovel in mud, grease or dust under a car to work a "handle" that is apt to fly up with unpleasant results. To lift a car with the Weed Chain-Jack, simply give a few easy pulls on its endless chain while you stand erect—clear from springs, tire carriers and other projections. To lower a car pull the chain in opposite direction.

Never gets out of order. Gears and chain wheel protected by a stamped-steel housing. Chain heavily plated to prevent rusting. Has a strong cap, providing the kind of support from which an axle will not slip, while a broad base prevents the jack from upsetting on uneven roads. Quickly adjusted to any required height by lifting the screw and spinning the corrugated "collar" shown in the illustration. Try it yourself—you will never be satisfied with any other jack.

A Banquet of Fruit

Is at Your Instant Call in Jiffy-Jell Desserts

Real-Fruit Dainties

There is nothing artificial, nothing unreal about Jiffy-Jell fruit desserts.

They are flavored with fruit-juice essences—highly condensed—in liquid form, in vials. They bring you the delights of fruit, the healthfulness of fruit. And they bring them now, when you need fruit most, at a fraction of what fruit costs.

You have your choice of the finest fruits, and each fruit flavor is made from the fruit itself.

You get the fragrant fresh-fruit flavor, because we seal it up. The fruit essence is retained in glass—a bottle in each package—until you are ready to use it.

And you get these exquisite, real-fruit desserts at a very little price. Jiffy-Jell costs no more than other quick gelatine dainties. A single package serves six people in mold form, or twelve if you whip the jell. All for 12½ cents—far less than pies or puddings cost.

Try this rich fruity dainty. Fresh fruits are costly now. Canned fruits are not abundant. Jiffy-Jell brings you their delights and their benefits in convenient, economical form. It will change your whole conception of quick gelatine desserts.

You Can Take Hills on High Without A Knock

If you will keep your motor free from carbon. That knocking in your engine—the difficulty you have climbing hills—poor pickup—lack of power—noisy motor—pre-ignition—in fact 80% of engine trouble is caused by carbon. Clean it out with and your engine will run like it did the first 500 miles—quietly and full of "pep". And your gasoline consumption will drop 12% to 25%.

Do It Yourself

For 65c—five minutes' time—and no labor you, yourself, can remove all carbon deposits. Pour or spray an ounce of Johnson's Carbon Remover into each cylinder through the petcocks or spark plug openings. Let the car stand for half to three-quarters of an hour; then take your car out on the road, drive it 10 or 15 miles at a fairly good rate of speed. You will be surprised at the wonderful improvement.

Use It Every 500 Miles

If you will use Johnson's Carbon Remover at regular intervals giving carbon no chance to accumulate, you will automatically eliminate most valve trouble and your engine will always be at its highest efficiency.

New League of Nations Covenant

Revised Draft Meets Objections and Includes Specific Recognition of the Monroe Doctrine

AFTER days, weeks, months of waiting, in which hope alternated with fear, the light of peace promised to rest upon the world again at Easter. For over three months statesmen of the Allied and neutral nations have wrestled with the problems that stood tween a state of war and a settled and ordered peace. ne by one the problems have yielded to argument d friendly counsel, but the speed was slow. A ouncil of Ten was organized. Then, to increase eed, this was reduced to four, and Wilson, Lloyd eorge, Clemenceau and Orlando began a series of nferences from which has now come a practical reement.

On April 14, the questions of reparation, responsi- lity for the war, the League of Nations, the German oundaries, economic relief to friend and former foe, e Turkish territories and the German colonies were ut of the way, ready for acceptance at a plenary ses- on of the Peace Conference. Of the major questions, nly the Italian-Jugoslav dispute over the Adriatic nd Fiume remained, and the possibility of trouble ere had been so greatly reduced that Lloyd George lanned to return to London on April 14, and to ad- ress Parliament on April 16, leaving Arthur J. Bal- our to represent him at the Conference.

It was expected that the German representatives ould be called to Versailles before the end of Easter eek to receive the terms of peace, but these might ot be made public until they had been submitted to he German National Assembly at Weimar.

The Peace Conference Commission of the League f Nations on April 12 completed the redrafting of he covenant. President Wilson on April 11 presented n amendment to Article X, which was adopted nanimously, and is paragraph 4 in the following summary:

An attempt of the Japanese delegates, led by Baron Makino in an eloquent address, to insert a clause in the preamble of the League Covenant which would make it declare that the members of the League were seeking to insure peace "by the indorsement of the principle of equality of nations and just treatment of their nationals," resulted in several sympathetic replies. It was evident, however, that it could not prevail, and the draft was passed without it. The vote was 11 to 6 for the clause, but a unanimous vote was required.

The following summary of the redrawn Covenant of the League of Nations was made public on the 12th:

Official Summary of the Revised Covenant of the League of Nations

1—The League of Nations is founded in order to promote international cooperation and to secure peace. The league will include: (A) The belligerent states named in a document annexed to the covenant, (B) all the neutral states so named, and (C) in the future any self-governing country whose admission is approved by two-thirds of the states already members.

A state may withdraw from the league, provided it has kept its obligations to date, on giving two years' notice.

2—The league will act through an assembly comprising not more than three representatives of each of the member states, each state having only one vote, and a council comprising for the present one representative of each of the five great Powers and each of four other Powers as selected from time to time by the assembly.

The number of Powers of each class represented on the council may be increased by the unanimous consent of the council and a majority of the assembly. Other Powers have the right to sit as members of the council during the decision of matters in which they are especially interested.

In the council, as in the assembly, each state will have only one vote. Both these bodies are to meet at stated intervals (the council at least once a year, and at other times if required); both can deal with any matter that is of international interest or that threatens the peace of the world; the decision of both must be unanimous, except in certain specified cases, matters of procedure, for instance, being decided by a majority vote.

The league will have a permanent secretariat, under a secretary-general. The secretariat and all other bodies under the league may include women, equally with men. A permanent Court of International Justice and various permanent commissions and bureaus are also to be established.

3—The member states agree: (A) To reduce their armaments, plans for such reduction being suggested by the council, but only adopted with the consent of the states themselves, and thereafter not to increase them without the concurrence of the council, (B) to exchange full information of their existing armies and their naval and military programs, and (C) to respect each other's territory and personal independence and to guarantee them against foreign aggression.

(D)—To submit all international disputes either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council, which latter, however, may not pronounce an opinion on any dispute whose subject matter falls solely within a state's domestic jurisdiction; in no case to go to war till three months after an award or a unanimous recommendation has been made, and even then not to go to war with a state which accepts the award.

(E)—To regard a state which has broken the covenant as having committed an act of war against the league, to break off all economic and other relations with it and to allow free passage through their territories to the troops of those states which are contributing armed force on behalf of the league. The council is to recommend what amount of force, if any, should be supplied by the several governments concerned, but the approval of the latter is necessary. (States not members of the league will be invited to accept the obligations of the league for the purpose of particular disputes, and if they fail to comply may be forced.)

(F)—Not to consider any treaty binding till it has been communicated to the league, which will then proceed to publish it, to admit the right of the assembly to advise the reconsideration of treaties and international conditions which do not accord with present needs, and to be bound by no obligations inconsistent with the covenant.

A state which breaks its agreements may be expelled from the league by the council.

4—The covenant does not affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe Doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

5—The former German colonies and the territories of the Ottoman Empire are to be administered in the interests of civilization by states which are willing to be mandataries of the league, which will exercise a general supervision.

6—The member states accept certain responsibilities with regard to labor conditions, the treatment of natives, the white slave traffic, the opium traffic, the arms traffic with uncivilized and semi-civilized countries, transit and trade conditions, public health and Red Cross societies.

7—The league is recognized as the central body interested in coordinating and assisting international activities generally.

8—Amendments to the covenant require the approval of all the states in the council and a simple majority of those in the assembly. States which signify their dissent from amendments thus approved are not bound by them, but, in this case, cease to be members of the league.

PARIS reports on April 10 showed the President forcing matters to a conclusion, while French and British opinion daily became more insistent upon full reparation and more anxious through fear that something less than this would be exacted.

Lloyd George, whose government was carried to victory in the recent elections on the two campaign slogans, "Hang the Kaiser" and "Make Germany Pay," was also under fire from home, the British press evidencing an increasing strain of criticism of the Premier's apparent softening attitude. On April 9 the Premier sent a message to Parliament declaring "My colleagues and I mean to stand faithfully by all the pledges which we gave our constituents." He indicated in this dispatch that he was also ready to appeal to the country if necessary. This message of Lloyd George was in answer to a telegram sent by 370 members of the House of Commons, demanding that the Premier make out a bill against Germany for the full cost of the war, and compel the German Government to acknowledge it, and then to discuss ways and means of payment.

300 members of the French Chamber of Deputies on April 12 signed a manifesto expressing the hope that full restitution would be imposed "on those responsible for the greatest crime in history," and that the Peace Treaty provide legal and territorial guarantees of sufficient strength to prevent future wars.

April 9 saw practical agreement in the Inner Council on the question of reparation, it being decided to place in the treaty no fixed amount of damages, but to define what the damages were and to hold Germany to the payment of them when they were ascertained. A commission is to be established to decide the amount to be paid and to direct its collection. The first payment of $5,000,000,000 is to be due May 1, 1921. It was reported that a decision had been reached under which the Saar coal fields would be placed under the supervision of the League of Nations for a period of fifteen years, at the end of which time the inhabitants would be permitted to vote upon the form of government under which they were to continue.

The Inner Council of the Peace Conference on April 10, after consideration of the report of the Committee of Responsibility, decided that William Hohenzollern, former Emperor of Germany, should be placed on trial before an International High Tribunal, specially constituted for the purpose, he to be tried on charges of violation of international law and violation of the sanctity of treaties, for both of which he is held personally responsible.

THE TURBULENT FAR EAS

THE continued growth of the Korean revolt has led the Japanese Government to adopt more serious repressive measures. Six battalions of infantry were despatched to the peninsula on April 12 to reinforce the more than 50,000 troops already there.

The government has made an official statement on the situation, which indicates the Koreans have abandoned their plan of a passive resistance to Japanese administration. Serious riots are reported in "hundreds of places" and the destruction of much public property. Troops have been firing generally on crowds, and the Korean representatives in Shanghai, Vladivostok and San Francisco declare these attacks have amounted to what virtually are massacres on a large scale.

The Japanese police are conducting careful and frequent searches of American mission property for native propaganda. The American consulate in Seoul has protested without avail.

Three Presbyterian missionaries, the Rev. Samuel A. Moffatt of Madison, Ind., Rev. Ansel W. Gillis of Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, and the Rev. Eli M. Mowry of Mansfield, O., were arrested on April 10. The two former were released, but Mr. Mowry was held on the charge that his house was used for the printing of revolutionary propaganda. The state department in Washington says the matter is one of Japanese police administration, and that all the American consul can do is make sure the accused has a fair trial.

Members of the Philippine Mission came to the United States to present the memorial asking for the independence pledged by America and earned by the establishment of a stable government. Having presented the memorial the mission is seeing America, not as a spectacle, but in the interest of better understanding and more profitable commerce

The course of the American missionaries in Korea has been taken as a text for more anti-American editorials in a number of Tokio newspapers, one of which in its issue of April 13 declared "there is a limit to Japan's patience."

The bitter feeling which seems to be growing among the lower classes of Japanese against the United States, encouraged as it is by the "Junker" press, has been increased by the belief that it was the American peace delegation which prevented the inclusion of the racial equality clause in the league of nations covenant. The objection, which prevented the adoption of the clause, came from William M. Hughes, premier of the Australian commonwealth. British delegates were compelled to accede to Mr. Hughes' demands, and it was her occidental ally who denied to Japan the realization of one of her greatest national ambitions.

The most important development of the week in the Far East outside the strictly Japanese sphere was the agreement reached between the Cossack commander, General Semenoff, and the Kolchak Government at Omsk. Semenoff has been a rebel against the Kolchak dictatorship. By the terms of the agreement, Semenoff will command in his own district while the Omsk Government will provide funds for the maintenance of his corps. This leaves only one important force operating in the region east of Lake Baikal; a column under General Kalmikoff to whom Major-General Graves, American commander, is strongly opposed.

The Week in the World's News

VICTORY LOAN $4,500,000,000. Secretary of the Treasury Glass, on April 13, announced that the Victory Liberty Loan would be for $4,500,000,000 in the form of 3 and 4 year convertible gold notes, carrying 4¾ per cent. interest, and exempt from state and local taxes, except estate and inheritance taxes, and from normal Federal income taxes. The Secretary declared that he was "assured the people of America would subscribe to this Victory Loan in the same spirit of patriotism they have shown in the past to the end; that the notes may be as widely distributed as possible, and that our banking institutions may be left free to supply the credit necessary for the purpose of industry and commerce and the full employment of labor." It was announced, on April 10, that the various Federal Reserve Bank Districts would be asked to sell the same percentage each of the Victory Liberty Loan for which they were responsible in the 4th Liberty Loan. In the 4th Liberty Loan every district exceeded its quota.

Hoover Would Feed Russia. Herbert Hoover proposed in London on April 10, the organization of an Interallied relief commission, to be headed by Dr. Nanson of Norway, which would undertake the feeding of Russia on condition that hostilities cease within that country. Mr. Hoover's plan was presented to the Council of Four of the Peace Conference by President Wilson on April 11. The French opposed the plan, as an indirect recognition of the Bolshevist Government. It was reported that the deaths directly or indirectly due to Bolshevism had reached 200,000 monthly in Soviet Russia and that there were no longer in Petrograd any children under 2 years of age.

There was a rumor in Paris on April 12 that the Russian Bolshevist Government had offered to cease executing its opponents and to suspend its propaganda activities in other lands in return for food and raw materials.

Reds Win at Odessa. The Allied forces, consisting of French, Greek, and Rumanian troops, evacuated Odessa on the Black Sea on April 8, under pressure from Ukrainian Bolshevist troops, the Allies retiring toward the Rumanian frontier. The capture of Odessa and the territory which it controlled gave the Bolsheviki rich agricultural territory and caused considerable uneasiness in Paris. The Bolshevist troops which captured Odessa continued to advance into the Crimea, capturing the Crimean Capital, Simferopol, on April 12.

American Troops Mutiny. It became known, on April 8, that a regiment of American troops fighting on the Archangel front in Russia had declared that since they had been drafted for the war with Germany and the armistice with Germany had been declared, and the United States was not at war with the Bolsheviki, they did not see why they should keep on fighting. But when convinced by the Commander that the Allied armies were in a battle for their lives, the men consented to take their turn at the front. The troops were said to have suffered under the hardships and loneliness of the Arctic winter, and to have become dissatisfied under the impact of Bolshevist propaganda. A force of American and British volunteers was on its way to relieve the hard-pressed Allies on April 10, and the War Department announced that they expected to have all the American troops out of North Russia by June 1.

The Bolshevist troops on the Archangel front, through the whole week ending April 6, made several attacks against the Allied positions, but gained no success, losing 700 dead and wounded, and over 100 as prisoners. An attack planned for April 12 was forestalled by an Allied attack, the Allies taking a town, seven guns and much material.

Hungarian Reds Established. General Smuts, who was sent on a special mission to Budapest, returned to Paris on April 9, and reported that the Bolshevist Government was well installed and that it showed a disposition to meet the Allies amicably on all questions consistent with the nature of the Bolshevist régime. He reported that the Russian Government at Moscow had offered to send an army of 150,000 men to assist the Hungarians.

Industrial Justice in Canada. The Canadian Minister of Labor, on April 8, appointed a commission to investigate and report upon the feasibility of forming industrial councils throughout Canada, involving the representation of labor upon the director industry. The findings of the commission w pected to be given legislative effect at the next in Canadian Parliament. Both captains of in and leaders of labor have endorsed the p change in industrial conditions.

Bolshevism in Germany. A National Co of delegates of Soldiers' and Workers' C opened in Ber April 9. He als nounced that, less the Soviet ernment establi at Munich w drew in favor of the legally constituted Soci Government, German troops would be used to f its submission.

The Soviet republic in Bavaria did not meet remarkable success, and on April 11 it was repo overthrown by force of arms; a new government b organized by the Communists under a Council of T and on April 13 the Socialist Government of Pre Hoffman reasserted its authority sending a repres tative to Munich. Bolshevist riots occurred in M deburg and other Saxon towns on April 8. strike of 15,000 persons at Essen in the great works forced the Ebert Government to send troop Unrest in Saxony coupled with a mistaken ru that the pay of wounded soldiers was to be redu resulted, on April 12, in an attack on the war minis in Dresden, in which the Minister of War, Neuri was captured and murdered. Bolshevism was s to be gaining ground in Saxony, which might beco the next Soviet republic.

Railroad Wages Up. The Railroad Administ tion, on April 10, agreed to grant an additional crease in wages to train crews, which will add $6 000,000 a year to the bill for railway labor, making in round figures $3,000,000,000, and making a to increase since 1916 of $1,260,000,000 per annum. T total increase in railway income from rate increa was $1,200,000,000, while the increased cost of oth material and supplies is $500,000,000 a year, maki the total increase in the cost of railroad operati $1,750,000,000 a year.

Austria Asks for Troops. The Conference of So diers' Councils in German-Austria, on April 10, d cided against the establishment of a Soviet republic Austria. The Austrian authorities, however, we reported to have asked for the sending to Vienna of force of American, British and French troops. A tempts of communists to establish Soviets in Austr and to disturb labor conditions resulted in numero strikes. At Donawitz 10,000 smelting works en ployees drove out the managers because wage i creases were refused. A prominent Austrian wa quoted as declaring, "The only salvation here is to ki Bolshevism with work, but we cannot give work unle we can secure raw material from abroad."

Relieving Hunger. Herbert Hoover, Allie Director-General of Relief, announced on April 1 that during March $95,000,000 worth of foodstuff had been distributed, all but $12,500,000 on a basis o deferred payment. Poland received 51,745 tons o supplies, Finland 26,344 tons, the Baltic States 2,75 tons, Czechoslovakia 20,911 tons, German-Austria 38,156 tons, Greater Serbia 33,920 tons, Rumania 26,067 tons, Turkey 2,298 tons, Armenia 5,251 tons Belgium 145,664 tons, Northern France 6,906 tons Germany 6,787 tons of breadstuffs, 740 tons of fats.

Carranza Troops Kill Zapata. Mexican Government troops were reported, on April 11, to have captured and killed the revolutionist Emiliano Zapata.

KOREA DEMANDS FREEDOM

THE funeral of the deceased Korean Emperor Yi was to take place. Yi, who had ruled since 1864, was not entitled to particular consideration at the hands of his people, and up to the time of his death did not enjoy their affection.

But his death transformed him into a national hero, for it was generally ieved by Koreans that he had committed suicide force the postponement for three years, under the rean custom, of the marriage of Prince Yi, a young y, to a Japanese princess.

And so the obsolete old emperor suddenly became hero to twenty millions of people, a captive nation der Japan's iron rule. They desired to give him a neral according to ancient Korean rites, but this was used them by the Japanese, and arrangements for great Japanese military funeral with Shinto cere- onies went on apace. From all parts of the Korean ninsula the Koreans flocked to Seoul for ten days the rate of 5,000 a day.

Suddenly, on the Saturday preceding the funeral—arch 1, at 2 P.M.—without hint to the foreign popu- ion and without suspicion of the Japanese rulers, ere was inaugurated in every large city of Korea a ssive demonstration and demand for national inde- ndence.

"It is our solemn duty," states the declaration, "to cure the right of free and perpetual development of r own national character, adapting ourselves to the inciples of the reconstruction of the world to secure r independence, to wipe out injuries, get rid of our esent sufferings, and leave our children eternal free- om instead of a bitter and shameful inheritance."

The Independence Union and the Korean National ssociation abroad have elected delegates to the Peace onference, one of whom is already in Paris.

The Japanese have replied with force and cruelty. n early telegram reported that 500 had been killed, d a more recent one states that ten thousand were illed in two days. Thousands are reported to have een thrown into prison and many subjected to inhu- an treatment. A little girl, it is said, who held up copy of the declaration in her hands had her arms evered. Japanese soldiers are said to be coming in om Japan, and the dread specter of wholesale slaugh- ers and terrorism, such as followed the days of early apanese occupation, looms over the land.

A Peking dispatch on March 12 reported that stu- ents of the Ping-Yang Presbyterian Theological School d been seized, stripped and tied to wooden crosses, hich they were obliged to carry through the city, their aptors saying that as their Father had borne the cross, hey, too, should have the privilege of bearing it.

Meanwhile the Koreans have carried on the policy of passive resistance by closing all the schools, the Korean children having ceased to attend, and by ceasing work in the various enterprises.

Song Pyung Yi, head of the principal native religious sect in Korea, has been named president of the recently declared Korean provisional government, with headquarters in Manchuria.

The Korean proclamation was signed by thirty-three prominent Korean religious leaders and teachers, carefully selected so as to represent the Chun De Kyo, the Buddhists and the three Christian religions most prominent in Korea—the Methodist, the Presbyterians and the Catholics—so as to demonstrate that the movement for independence was not factional.

These leaders were arrested. The first signature to the proclamation was that of Song Pyung Yi, head of the Chun De Kyo. And here again the Japanese rulers received a distinct shock, for on the Chun De Kyo they had confidently relied for effective assistance in so subjugating the Koreans that there would be no trace of their nationality in the coming generations. The Chun De Kyo is a cult whose teachings are said to be a combine of Buddhist, Taoism, ancestral worship and Korean superstition. The cult was encouraged by the Japanese on the theory that it would stop the spread of Christianity, whose teachings, with the doctrines of Democracy, were believed to be bad for the political digestion of the Koreans.

It is certain that the Chun De Kyo and its leaders were apparently playing the Japanese game for years by inducing the Koreans to submit quietly to Japanese rule, and that the rulers encouraged its growth. It is said to have now about 3,000,000 members.

IN 1904 Korea, in a treaty with Japan, conceded to her the use of the peninsula for the prosecution of the war with Russia, with the understanding that when the war was over Korea was to regain her full independence. About a year later, with the country helpless in the grip of the Japanese, as all military facilities were in their hands and the country was full of Japanese soldiers, Prince Ito, with a detachment of soldiers, compelled the Korean cabinet, at the point of the gun, to cede Korean independence, while the Japanese proceeded to inform the world that Korea had voluntarily given itself over to the "protectorate" of Japan.

A rigid spy system was put in operation. Every one must be registered and is given a number, which is known to the police. Every time one leaves his village or town he must register at the police station and state fully the business he intends to transact and his destination.

This policy is carried out in the educational system by forbidding the teaching of Korean history or geography; by permitting only teachers who can speak Japanese, only text-books published by the Japanese government, only branches of instruction which are utilitarian and do not develop mental scope or power; by excluding all European history or literature or any subject which might lead to such a personal culture; by discouraging and practically depriving Korean students of the right of higher education; by forbidding them to leave the country; by ordering the worship of the Emperor's tablet and picture; by compelling them to celebrate Japanese holidays and prodding them into demonstrations of Japanese patriotism; by forbidding them to entertain or express Korean ideas or aspirations. One student was put in jail for three months and fined $300 because he was caught singing the Korean national anthem.

This policy is carried out in religion by forbidding pastors to preach without a license from the Japanese government; by forbidding any religious meeting or gathering to be held without a special permit; by forbidding the teaching of the Bible, even in many mission schools; by forcing students in the government schools to work on Sunday; by commanding all to bow to the Emperor's portrait; by having detectives in every church service, who arrest pastors for showing emotion or using strong expressions in their sermons or being too earnest in their prayers. This repression has gone to such limits that one pastor was arrested for preaching on the Kingdom of God instead of the kingdom of Japan. At one time the hymn, "I Am an Ambassador for the King," was suppressed because it "contained seditious sentiments." Propaganda has been instituted to undermine the faith of the Christians.

In 1912 the church became the special victim of an unusually ferocious outburst. In different parts of the country large numbers of Korean pastors and Christian leaders were arrested and subjected to terrible tortures, while the churches and Christians at large were kept in a constant ferment by the indignities and the show of frightfulness which the Japanese gendarmerie continually brandished over them. The famous conspiracy case, in which some one hundred and twenty Christian leaders were tried on the ludicrous charge of conspiring to take the life of the Governor-General, attracted the attention of the world.

The Japanese fear and dislike Christianity in Korea because it contains the seeds of liberty and democracy, and hence this repression and this oppression which make the church the victim of so unjust a surveillance and make Christian leaders constantly liable to arrest, banishment or even worse fates.

THE BELGIAN BATTLE LINE

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ONE thinks that the French devastated land is the most desolate sight in the world—until one has seen the Belgian battle line. And the ruined French villages seem the height of horror until one tries to find a Belgian village and discovers that there is not even a whole brick where that village once stood. A broken French church may bring tears to the eyes, but a Belgian church that has been reduced to a small heap of dust and powder makes the hands clench in an impotent fury.

From the vantage point of Europe the world seems like a small wheel revolving with amazing rapidity. I suppose that it seems so to every American in Europe; and that the center of that wheel is, for each American, a different place. For me the center of the wheel was Paris. It was from Paris that I started out on every little journey; to Paris that I always returned. And so it was from Paris, in the cold gray of early morning, that I started on my trip to Brussels.

The train left the Gard du Nord at six o'clock; a most horrible time for any train to leave. As the porter showed me into the dark, very cold compartment that I was to spend the day in (the train, which is always from six to twelve hours late, is supposed to make the journey in one day), I saw that it was already very nearly full. An English officer wrapped in a brown army blanket slept heavily in one corner, sitting bolt upright against the wall; a French cavalryman talked in low tones to a French artillery captain, directly across from him; an Australian in his jaunty uniform struggled, by the dim light of the window, to translate the idiomatic French of an illustrated paper. Falling over four pairs of outstretched masculine feet, I gained a vacant space and sank into it with a sigh, while the two Frenchmen continued to talk and the English officer kept on sleeping. Only the Australian raised his eyes and looked at me, with the flicker of a smile, across the top of the illustrated paper.

One becomes used to the enforced intimacy of the French trains. One looks eagerly around a compartment, on entering it, to see whether there are any possibilities of an interesting conversation. For a twelve-hour trip in a French train becomes very dull without an interesting conversation. Glancing around covertly, I saw small prospect of that conversation, for the sleeping Englishman was very stolid and the Frenchmen were talking in such rapid French that I could not hope to follow it. Only the Australian, who met my searching look and smiled again, seemed friendly.

AND then—just as the train was about to move, the Boy bounced in, followed by a porter with his numerous bags. He was smiling, vividly young, red-cheeked, and alive with the spirit of adventure. He was eternal boy, and the car seemed to come to life at his entrance.

"Mademoiselle will pardon—yes?" he questioned as he put a great suitcase on the rack above my head. "M'sieu—oh, I am soree!" as he stumbled over the feet of the sleeping Englishman. "I 'ave to run!" he informed the compartment at large, "so it is zat I always catch ze train—nevar're do I have ze minute to spare!" And he flung himself into the seat beside me.

The train, as if in answer, pulled suddenly out of the station. And we all laughed, while the Boy delightedly reached into his pocket and pulled out a great piece of chocolate, which is the luxury of luxuries in France. He broke it gravely. "'Ave some?" he questioned, "S'il vous plait!" he added.

We all had some. For with the breaking of the chocolate the ice had been broken too. By nine o'clock we were all friends. And by nine o'clock we were far enough beyond the city limits to recognize the signs of a once active warfare. Again I began to see the barbed-wire entanglements; again I began to see the grotesque snake-like line of the trenches that swept across the landscape.

"You 'ave—" it was the Boy speaking—"you 'ave been here before, mademoiselle?"

"No," I answered. "And you?"

The stolid Englishman raised his eyes. He, instead of the Boy, answered me——

"Four years I've been here," he told me. "I came out with the first lot. Heavy artillery—all over this section!" He relapsed into silence.

The French cavalryman spoke.

"I," he said rather hesitatingly, "I joined the armee on the twentieth of August, 1914. We came at once, my division, to Belgium—I will show you the pla I 'ave fought at. I stayed until February, 19 Then"—he shrugged—"I was—how you Americ say it—out of luck! I was hit—in t'ree places. I ' not fought since!"

The other Frenchman spoke little English. "I ' no wounds," he told me half regretfully. "But too, since the first—'ave fought!"

The Australian laughed.

"We went over with the Yanks!" he said proud "two years in this blasted hole, what? An' it's over he laughed.

For an instant the animation died from the Bo face——

"I was too young!" he sighed—"me—I am n eighteen! If th' war 'ave last I would 'ave soon My brother—he go. He—he die—at St. Quentin!

WE WERE all very quiet for many minutes. F the first time I noticed that there was a bla band around the sleeve of the Boy!—and I noticed similar black band against the horizon blue of t French captain's uniform. We were all very still we went on through country that was broken, maime swept clear of beauty. And each one of the men wh shared the compartment with me was staring out the flying landscape with eyes that saw a differe picture—a picture of death and defeat, of swiftl moving columns, of men who fell and rose, bleeding suffering, to fight again. They looked out across th fields that once had been battle grounds and sa things that I could never even dream.

I—I could imagine what had happened on the curi ously level ground that we were passing over. I sa curiously level, because whole trees had been broke away near the roots; because houses were gone eve to the last timber; because little hills were smoothe out and pleasant slopes were laid even with the res of the ground. I could imagine what had happened but those men, all of them, were actually seeing what had happened.

"Once"—it was the English officer—"we were stationed in the town that we're passing through now and——"

"But," I interrupted, "there's no town here—it's all empty!"

The English officer went on, imperturbably. "There was a town here," he told me, "and once, when we were stationed here, the order came to send out lorreys full of ammunition—enough for a bar- that we were to put over at dawn. I was in , then, of the motor lorreys and of getting out mmunition. It was a nippy night, with a flurry ow in our faces, and I'll never forget the way lorreys looked, toddling up the road to the place they would have to dump the ammunition. Have you ever a train of ammunition lorreys hit by dozens of Then—" suddenly he stopped talking. And w the picture that he was seeing!

t was when the Twenty-second French Canadian lion took the sugar factory at Courcelettes"— s the French cavalryman who spoke next—"that my hardest fighting! It was in September—in We lost of us four hundred. We fought very And all about me they fell, our dead. It was my comrade, who had gone with me through ge—it was when my comrade slipped down on tones at my feet that I cried. But I could not e, there beside him. I went on, sobbing. I " the French cavalryman was seeing his picture there against the drab meadows—"and I fired . One of the shots was for him—" With a flung arm he pointed to a single bent steeple in listance. "There lies Courcelettes," he told me.

HE other Frenchman, the captain, was talking rapidly in his own language. I caught a word or but it was not until the cavalryman translated quick sentences for me that I could quite under- d.

It were during the retreat from Cambrai," the lryman translated, "that he—le capitaine—saw worst of the battles. He were then attached to English forces—as a courier sent out to bring what remain of each division.

HE Boy was opening a bag. From it he took an enormous box of luncheon. His round face was ve with the tragedy of war, but he was all boy— hungry. "It was time," he remarked, r le déjeuner. 'Ave anysing to eat?"

We all, it transpired, something to eat. all got out the sand- hes or cakes that we concealed in some t of our luggage. We ate silently; the Boy enously. Only once the Australian inter- t.

'Over there," he said, inting, I think, west, ies the town of Albert. ere's an odd story out Albert. There a church there with rucifix on the top of The bombardment the town was always ' shelled—loosened e crucifix, and it began slant until it hung out er the road. It was a crucifix, and the asants were afraid that would fall and jolly l kill some of 'em. t of the fear grew a perstition that, when crucifix did fall, the ar would end. And, range though it seems, came true. For one y the crucifix did come ashin' down, an' a w days later, sure ough, the war did end!"

The afternoon was creeping on. The train, as if getting its good start, was going more slowly. We ere passing banks now in which we could see elabo- te German dugouts with doors and windows, dug- uts with green camouflaged wire still over them.

"I saw some great dugouts through here." It was e Australian again. "They're fixed up like club- oms, some of 'em. Once we found officers' quarters a dried-up well. It was made into rooms cut at tervals down th' shaft. Like a bloomin' apartment ouse it was. They had a ladder to go down on.

"We didn't have much time to make fancy dugouts—not in our army," the English officer broke in. "We didn't have much time. We had to keep hoppin' along up here through this country. I've slept in mud many times. It's not bad to sleep in—mud. But it gives you rheumatism, after. And sometimes fever."

The Boy was talking.

"I had fever once," he told me. "I were very ill an' so were my mother. It were just after we heard of my brother's death. I were in bed, too seeck to know sleep, an' my mother, she were screamin'—she were, do you call it deeleerious? It were the Spanish grippe we have. An' it were on the night when we were worst that the German aeroplane drop bombs over our house, which is not far from Paris. One fall in our garden an' keel all of our rose trees. Another strike in a lake that are a part of our grounds. An' we have fever. It is not pleasant, the fever!"

All at once, and in the middle of a great wasted space, the train stopped. The French captain sighed.

"It mean—" he said in his broken English, "that we are much late in arrive by Brussels!"

"ONCE," the French cavalryman spoke, "we were in a train that stop for thirty-six hours. We were wounded and aching—yes. Some of us were crying for our loved ones. Some were praying to le bon Dieu for—mercy. But the train stopped, just as this have stopped—an' for over a day.

"You see, it were during a great drive. An' we were only wounded men. An', up by the battle line, it were fresh fighters that were needed as—do you say—reinforcements! An' the order came through to hurry along those fighters.

"We were being sent to a hospital station. Some of us were very bad hurt. But a clear track were needed for the troop trains. An' in war it are the fighters that are needed. The wounded, they cannot be of help any longer. They are"—the French cavalryman laughed, "out of it! Those of us who were strong enough to 'ave sense—we understand!

"They push our train onto a siding. It was in a blank field—like this field that we are in is blank. An' we lie there, waiting, while train after train goes by on the main track. Some of us are screaming—yes—after the first few hours. But some of us are quiet—ver' quiet. An' always comes to our ears the rumble of the trains going up to the front—where we have come from.

"There was a man lying with hees head across my feet—it are a very crowded train. He talks, most of the time, of a rose garden in the moonlight. An' then he give me a photograph of a girl with big eyes and curls. Tell her"—he whisper. And when I ask of him her name he does not answer. So I cannot tell her—ever. Across my feet he lie there—an' his eyes are open. . . . We are in that train for thirty-six hours!"

"Somewhere in Belgium." Most any town along the French border

WE WERE all still for a moment. Then the Englishman cleared his throat abruptly.

"Funny, isn't it," he remarked, "how there's always a woman that a feller thinks of—there at th' last. Sometimes it's his mother—most always it is. Sometimes it's his wife—if he has one. Sometimes it's his sweetheart. But it's always some woman.

"I saw a chap go west one night. He'd been a man who'd never mentioned a girl's name, had, never as far as we knew, noticed a girl. But at the last he spoke—

" 'She never cared,' he said over and over. 'She never cared. Dear God, why couldn't she understand!' And then he'd half sob and repeat it over again.

"He didn't mention her name. He just died. But we who were with him had a look into his heart. An' there was a woman there. An' later, when we were goin' over his things—destroyin' them, for we'd nowhere to send them—we found a picture, too. It had been torn up an' then pasted together again, ever so carefully. It showed a shallow little fluffy face—that was all. We thought of burnin' it, at first, but we ended by buryin' it with him. After all, it must have meant a lot."

There was a pause, and then—

"Seein' a fellow die ain't fun," said the Australian. "I remember the first dead 'un I got a look at.

"I'd been in a dugout all night, writin' dispatches. An' it was cold an' beastly. An' along toward dawn my candles were all used up. An' I stepped to the mouth of the dugout to get a breath of air.

"It was rainin'—not hard, but nasty. An' the sky was a sick gray in the east. An' as I stepped outside, I kicked th' elbow of a feller who was lyin' across th' doorway.

"I was new at th' war game. So I said, casual like —'Sorry, old chap; but it is a rather inconvenient place to sleep!' And when he didn't answer I stooped down and shook him. And then I saw that he was gone.

"I straightened up, there in the cold and the half-darkness. And I felt sort of weak-kneed, and tired, and 'This is war!' I said to myself."

IT WAS very cold in the compartment, for, since the beginning of the war, many French trains go unheated. We wrapped coats, sweaters, anything around our feet and looked out across the frozen country. The Boy began to sing a light little chanson with a chorus that he kept repeating and repeating. He smiled as he sang. The Australian leaned close to my side.

"The young 'un," he whispered, "makes me feel old. Blame me if he doesn't. Fancy singin'—with your feet cold and no prospects of gettin' anywhere till midnight—"

I didn't answer. I was thinking of the songs that those men in the compartment with me must have sung during their years of fighting over meadows like the one that our train was standing on. Songs that they sang while their feet were cold and their hearts were colder and there wasn't any prospect of ever getting anywhere. All at once I understood what they had gone through, and what the end—the victorious end of it all—must have meant to them. I looked out to the line of the horizon—a bleak horizon line with every distinctive mark shot away from it—and I, too, saw pictures.

The French cavalryman heard the Australian whisper. He spoke huskily.

"Me," he said, "I am twenty-nine in years. But I am over forty, really. Four years of war, she have take the laughter from my soul. And the song have gone—"

Jerkily the train started. But we were very still, there in the compartment. Only the Boy hummed on, his bright eyes ever on the fields that stretched far away.

It was growing dusky, and all at once I felt lonely, lonely and infinitely far away from everything in the world that had ever seemed dear to me. If there had been one spot of light in the countryside, one farmhouse with a glowing window, one blackly moving human figure against the twilight, I would have felt better. But there wasn't. It was country that had been fought over—fought over ruthlessly, defiantly, hopelessly. And the ruthlessness and defiance and hopelessness still cling to the tattered shreds of it.

Suddenly the Boy, who had been very quiet for some minutes, spoke.

"Over to the lef'," he told us in a hushed little voice, and all at once he seemed strangely like a certain very small boy in New York who comes to me with his baby heartaches, and his black-and-blue spots and his broken toys, "over to the lef' lie St. Quentin. Where my brother have die. He are only two years older zan me. An' his eyes they are blue!"

All at once the Boy was singing again; loudly, albeit shakily. It was the same light little song with the chorus. . . .

Thirty Years of Profit-Sharing

IN THE midst of the industrial unrest and uncertainty it is encouraging to note the increasing number of experiments that are being made in industrial democracy. Such experiments make for industrial peace. The very fact that so many employers are willing to put their concerns on a co-operative and profit-sharing basis is most encouraging and full of promise.

The Procter & Gamble Company was a pioneer in profit-sharing and its experience has been long and thorough. Accurate accounts of the actual operation of profit-sharing plans in other large institutions will follow.

The supreme import of the experiments is that a growing number of employers are beginning to concede that labor is something more than a commodity that can be bought in the open market like so much wood, coal or iron. A recognition of the human element, the man-to-man attitude, is the big thing about this great movement.

Autocracy in industry means that the employer decides the questions of wages, hours of service, and conditions of labor, relying on human necessities to compel an acceptance. Democracy in the industries signifies that the toilers have a voice in adjusting the hours and conditions affecting their work, and that they receive a more equitable share of the profits.

The duty of the pulpit and the church in this hour is not so much to take sides, as to create the atmosphere in which industrial democracy may become a reality all over the country. "Come, let us reason together" is steadily taking the place of the old autocratic declaration: "There is nothing to arbitrate."

WILLIAM COOPER PROCTER, president of the Procter & Gamble Company, is the pioneer in the movement to establish profit-sharing in factories. He is the third Procter to head the concern, which was started by his grandfather and Mr. Gamble over eighty years ago. He is the son of a rich man and did not have to lift a finger to get a start in life. In his youth he wanted to enter the army via West Point, but his family persuaded him to follow his father in the business. With this purpose in mind Procter attended Princeton, and then returned to his home to learn the business of his fathers. He did it in a most unexpected way. He packed away his college duds, put on overalls and began shoveling coal for a "salary" of $8 a week. From the coal pit he worked his way up through all the departments until he finally became president. One day during the early part of his career a dispute arose about the pay of the men working on a new building and a strike resulted. In the various efforts to settle the trouble young Procter advocated that the employees of the concern be put on a profit-sharing basis. It should be kept in mind that this proposition was not made by a labor agitator, but by a man whose pocketbook would suffer if the plan should be adopted. When he was asked why the profits should be divided he replied:

"Because it is right."

After many conferences it was decided that the profit-sharing plan should be inaugurated. It was determined that labor was 12 per cent. of the cost of production, and therefore labor should have 12 per cent. of the profits. When the plan was announced the men did not take to it very readily. They were suspicious, but after the first profit dividend was passed around they took a different view of the matter.

But ere long the men began to grumble. Procter found that agitators were telling the men that there was no difference between "wages" and "profits." Wages, they said, came out of one pocket and profits out of another, so where was the difference? Then Procter reached the conclusion that profit-sharing without thrift was a failure. The men were spending their increase, so that the percentage of the profits that had been distributed had not done them any good.

At length Procter worked out a method by which the men could buy the stock of the company on a payment plan. The next evolution of his plan was to induce the men to buy stock with their industrial profits.

THE company has had in operation since 1887 some form or other of profit-sharing. During the period from 1887 to 1890 the business was a partnership and all employees shared in the profits, the percentage of participation being set annually. In 1890 the business was incorporated, and thereafter for a few years all employees shared in the same percentage on their annual wage as was paid to the common stock. Later the participation was restricted to those earning $1,500 per annum or less. This continued until 1903, when it became evident that the plan in that form was ineffective. The employee received his profit-sharing dividends in cash semi-annually and in most cases had it spent in anticipation, and instead of its being, as it was intended to be, an incentive toward thrift, it really was a temptation to extravagance, so the plan was modified as follows:

In order that an employee might profit-share he is compelled to own common stock of the company to the amount of his annual wages. If he does not own this and cannot purchase it the company advances him money to do so, charging him interest at 3 per cent. on the unpaid balance. He is guaranteed against decline in the value of the stock, which is bought on the open market; he is compelled to pay an initial payment of 2½ per cent. on application and 4 per cent. annually. If he complies with these conditions the company credits his profit-sharing dividends, which continue to be the same as that declared on the common stock, and which at present is 20 per cent., and also, of course, dividends declared on the stock. This results in paying out in about five years, or in other words in five years the employee reaches a sum equal to his annual wages. The stock remains in the hands of trustees elected by the employees, but after it is fully paid up he receives his dividends on the stock in cash and his profit-sharing dividends in cash. After he has been a stockholder and profit-sharer for five years he is permitted to subscribe to an additional 25 per cent. and receive profit-sharing of 25 per cent., and after ten years' employment, to subscribe to an additional 25 per cent., making 150 per cent. in all, and receive profit-sharing dividends of 30 per cent.

MR. PROCTER'S investigation of conditions of other large manufacturing organizations led him to believe that something more was necessary than high wages and ideal working conditions in order that workmen may remain contented and continue in their employment, which is so very desirable. He found that where the highest wage sible were paid the percentage of turn-over was exceedingly high, so h veloped the Employees Conference C mittee, which is now in operation at of the three main plants. This is a mittee of employees elected by em ees, and meets monthly with a r sentative of the management to di and take action on matters of intere either or both.

The Ivorydale Employees Commi
for instance, recently made a repor from a ten-hour work-day to an ei hour work-day, and their report, w by the way calls for ten hours' pa eight hours' work and a minimum of cents per hour for common labor, accepted and published to the emplo and became effective March 10, 191

The employees also have been off the opportunity through their Confer Committee to select three representatives, one f each plant, whom the management will recommen the stockholders for election to the Board of Direct
This doubtless will be done during the next few mo and the election made effective at the annual st holders' meeting in October. The purpose of feature is, as you will see, to bring about a be understanding of the management's problems a keener interest on the part of the employees in t work, just as the profit-sharing and the Pension Benefit Plans, which are also in operation, are signed to create ease of mind through material w being and to influence toward length of service cause of increasing rewards for length of service.

THERE are probably three thousand men women in the employ of Procter & Gamble own stock and draw both kinds of dividends. H dreds of them own blocks of stock ranging in va from $1,000 to $15,000.

Women employees who prefer the certainties o

A man who had been with the company for thi

Industrial Readjustment

For Happiness of the Average Man

By HON. R. A. COOPER

Governor of South Carolina

THE prosecution of public works, especially road-building and the development of lands, would do much toward alleviation of the temporary unemployment situation; and, what is of more lasting importance, would result in strengthening the economic and social life of the nation. This, however, is but a phase of the readjustment now in process.

The fundamental principle underlying any sound industrial or economic readjustment must be consideration for the happiness of the average man. Industry frequently tends toward the elimination of individuality. This is unfortunate, as the man who functions as an automaton can scarcely attain the reasonable degree of happiness that rightfully is his. The much used word "efficiency" suggests a splendid ideal, provided its definition into terms of industry takes cognizance of the human side of workers. The hours of work must be such, and the conditions of work must be such, as to allow the workers to develop their social and intellectual life; else there cannot be any considerable degree of contentment, and neither can the workers attain the highest standard of citizenship.

It seems to me that agriculture intelligently pursued offers to the average man a greater degree of freedom and a greater chance for self-expression than does any other vocation. Hence I believe our readjustment should be planned to increase the attractiveness of rural life.

Can You Help a Returning Soldier Back to the Land?

MISS MARGARET SANGSTER in France encountered among the American soldiers a very general desire to get into farm life on their return home. The stalwart lads who went from offices, stores and shops have grown used to the open air existence and the physical activity, and are reluctant to return to the old confining occupations. In starting life anew they want to start right, and to thousands of them farming makes a strong appeal.

The land calls for the men as strongly as the men call for the land. Before the war, America exported approximately seven million tons of foodstuffs, products of the farm. We must now produce and export a surplus estimated at twenty-two million tons.

There are great big opportunities on the American farms for these deserving, dependable men; and members of the Christian Herald Family can help thousands of them to find just the openings they are looking for.

If you know of any opportunity in your community for a returning soldier to get into farming under good conditions, write the facts to the Editor of the Christian Herald.

ETTING READY FOR THE GROWING

Let Us Plant a Garden

By ELIZABETH CLARK HARDY

A GARDEN is a lovesome spot, God wot!
Rose plot, fringed pool, ferned grot—
The veriest school of peace, and yet the fool Contends that God is not—
Not God in gardens when the day is cool?
Nay, but I have a sign,
And sure am I God walks in mine."

ND so it always is to the earth-lover—a garden is a lovesome spot. To dig in the moist, smelly earth just after the first spring rain is a joy in itself. To plant the seeds and and then to watch them spring up and burgeon bloom in the summer sunshine is to feel a bit of oy of creation.

see the gladioli and the lilies in the flower en pushing up their slender blades, through the black soil, the syringias and spireas flowering white bloom, and the iris, the narcissus and the ies lifting their heads and smiling winsomely, could give a sweeter or more heartfelt joy?

ld then to watch the strawberries ripening in the and the apple and peach blossoms turning into en fruit; to lift gingerly the long sprays of blacky and raspberry and to prophesy hopefully of fruitage—all this is pure pleasure, unadulterated worldly care of social perplexity.

ld the vegetable garden has its own especial ht. From the time we plant the seeds and the green things begin to lift their heads in orderly , all through the hoeing and the weeding in the morning and the cool of the evening, there is ys so much of interest in this garden of ours. k there is, to be sure, but how peaceful and how y worth while is the work! The transplanting e tiny plants, the watching for the first sets on melon and cucumber vines, and the reckoning of days until we can have the first mess of sweet or green peas from our own garden, all this gives st and a joy to life.

nd then when the time comes when we can go in the early morning or the dewy evening and er the crisp, wholesome, home-grown vegetables our table, how well are we repaid for all our work! e strawberries ever so sweet and luscious, green corn and new peas as delicious, or uce and radishes as crisp and tender as those have planted and tended and gathered from own garden?

hen come, let us plant a garden. Let us l it and care for it and keep it in order and uty, that we may feel the full joy of posion. And when we walk in our garden at cool of day, peace and contentment will ompass our souls, and by this sign we shall w that God walks with us in our own garden, same as he walked in the first garden nted by his own hands.

Cynthia's Pansy Bed

By LAURA A. KIRKMAN

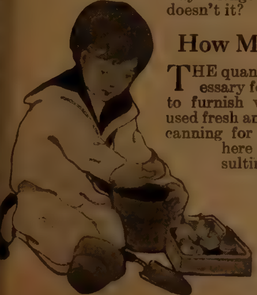
YNTHIA was given a dozen pansy plants by a generous neighbor, and the thought came her that a kind deed like this ought to be sed along. So she decided to scatter sunshine giving her flowers to those who had none.

he began by taking a bunch to her school cher, and it was strange how such a little dful of color on the teacher's desk could brighten the entire classroom.

ynthia next gave a bunch of the pansies to the old woman who came every week and who had no wers of her own.

The third person to receive the pretty blossoms s a sick schoolmate, and the fourth was her Sunday-ool teacher.

Many other lives were brightened by Cynthia's nsies, but the little girl wondered if those who reved them were half as happy as she, who gave them. For giving pleasure always brings joy to the giver, doesn't it?



How Much Seed?

THE quantities of seed necessary for 100 feet of row to furnish vegetables to be used fresh and for storing and canning for four people are here given. By consulting these lists the gardener who is limited to small area may determine which crops will be the most practical in his garden.

For a Family of Four.—Snap beans, one to two quarts, Stringless Green Pod, Wardwell's Wax; beet, four ounces, Crosby's Egyptian; early cabbage, one packet, Copenhagen Market; late cabbage, one-half ounce, Danish Ballhead; carrot, one ounce, Chantenay, Danvers Half Long; sweet corn, one to two pints, Country Gentleman, Evergreen; eggplant, one packet, Black Beauty; lettuce, one-half ounce, Grand Rapids, May King, Big Boston; onion (sets), four to six quarts, White Portugal, (seed) Yellow Danvers, eight ounces; pea, two to four quarts, Laxtonian; parsley, one packet, Moss Curled; radish, one ounce, Scarlet Globe; tomato, one packet, Bonny Best; cucumber, one ounce, White Spine (for slicing), Boston pickling (for pickling).

Quantity to the Row.—For 100 feet of row: Bean, one pint; beet, two ounces; cabbage, one-half ounce; corn, one-quarter pint; eggplant, one-quarter ounce; lettuce, one-half ounce; onion (seed), one ounce; sets, one quart; pea, one to two pints; potato, five to six pounds; radish, one ounce; tomato, one-eighth ounce.

Early Plants in the House

TO GROW certain early crops and to lengthen the growing period for others it is necessary to plant some vegetable seeds before outdoor conditions will permit. Early tomatoes, cabbage, cauliflower, peppers and lettuce may be had with no great labor and little outlay for equipment.

On a small scale plants may be easily started by using a "flat" or an old soap box. The box should be three to four inches deep, should have holes in the bottom to permit drainage, and should be small enough so that it can be easily handled when filled with soil.

Fill the box to within one-half inch of the top with fine loam, then firm the soil and have it perfectly level and free from stones, sticks or lumps before seed planting. Mark the rows with a straight stick that is as long as the box is wide, making the rows about one-fourth of an inch deep and two inches apart.

The seed should be covered very lightly, and they should not be over-watered, as that causes weak plants. Place the box near a window, preferably on the south side of the house, and turn the box every two or three days, so that plants will get equal amounts of sunlight from all sides.

Time of Planting.—The time of planting the seeds depends upon the approximate date of transplanting to the garden. Lettuce or cabbage can be set out of doors very early, and therefore can be started before tomatoes or peppers. As soon as the plants seem crowded in the box they should be transplanted or thinned so that they will not become spindly. In from six to eight weeks plants reach the transplanting size.

When it is necessary to provide more space for the growing seedlings they may be turned out in the box in which they are grown, thinning to one or two inches between plants; but if a large number of plants are needed, more boxes will be required, and the plants should be transplanted into them. When transplanting, set the plant a little deeper than it was in the original box, and when setting plants into the garden do not disturb the soil about the roots.

Before Spring Came

By ALDIS DUNBAR

TOUCH of the frost!
And light brown leaves along the lane were blowing,
As Winter hurried fast on Autumn's going;
Yet not one leaf was lost!

Fires on the hill!
Rare fragrant incense came from brush-piles burning,
From leaves and grasses back to earth returning,
Making it richer still!

But ashes now?
It was not death, but life that seemed to sunder
That which life gives anew in springtime's wonder,
Thrilling in root and bough!

The Spring Clean-Up

COOPERATING in the own-your-own-home campaign are thousands of men and women who already own their homes or who rent dwellings, and their part is to aid in the national clean-up and paint-up activities. The appeal to make every town and city in the country a better place to live in has been answered east and west, north and south. As the weather permits, improvements will be undertaken in every state on a more thorough scale than usual, for the home-coming of the soldiers adds a special stimulus to the annual labor of removing the winter's accumulations of rubbish.

Store-window exhibits arranged to suggest gardening, repair work and general improvements demonstrate that wherever the actual task of clearing up and painting up has been begun the idea of making a town or city healthful and beautiful has quickly spread.

The first thought naturally is the removal of dirt and waste matter from alleys and cellars. Business centers have been sadly neglected during the war and they present tasks that municipal governments must perform. In a number of the smaller cities volunteers are helping in this work, which is accepted as a patriotic service, since it makes for health and provides against and prevents the spread of disease.

Painting restores houses even when they have a most dilapidated appearance, and after the houses have been painted the next thought is the garden and lawn. Thus there is a demand for gardening tools and for grass seed and flower bulbs. "Spring cleaning" has always had a fascination for women, and for the last few years national interest in gardening has been on the increase.

Nickel May Save Cabbage

IT costs less than a nickel to protect five acres of cabbage from disease, say the plant pathologists at the New York State College of Agriculture; this amount of corrosive sublimate will treat a pound of seed, enough to grow five acres of cabbage.

Corrosive sublimate is sold by druggists as bichloride of mercury tablets. The directions for using it to treat cabbage seed follow: Dissolve the poison in the proportion of one part to one thousand, or one gram of poison to one quart of water. The seed should be soaked in this solution for twenty minutes.

This solution should be made in a stone jar or a wooden pail, because it corrodes metals. Immediately after the seed has been treated, spread it on a clean cloth in a warm room to dry quickly. When thoroughly dry, return the seed to a clean sack. Do not use the one that the seed was in before, for it still contains the spores of the diseases which were killed on the seed. It is well to use sacks which have also been dipped in the solution.

Disinfecting the seed will do no good if it is planted in an infected soil. A field which has had infected cabbage on it the year before will still contain the disease-producing matter, which will reinfect even healthy plants. Therefore a clean seed bed is as essential as a clean lot of seed.

We ask God for what we want, but when God opens the windows of heaven he supplies our needs, not our wants.

The seeds that in an apple you may find
You easily can count,
But who can add the apples in a seed
And give the right amount?

The Day of the "Common Man"

SOME thoughtful writer has asked why it is that, assuming opportunities to be fairly equal, only one man in a million or more develops that special quality which the world calls genius. This is an age of rediscovery, which has brought to the peoples a new revelation of themselves, a new and fuller idea of their birthright, and new glimpses of their future possibilities. Four years ago, to the great majority of Americans, this nation was one that gloried less in its genius than in its wealth and its constantly increasing resources. Most people would have said that we were ruled by the spirit of commercialism. All this has been changed. We have discovered that our nation has a soul which goes out to all humankind, and that its highest genius, its wonderful talents, its commercial treasures, were bestowed upon it that it might be able to employ them in rendering service to the world such as no other nation could give.

Many books have been written of late, touching the new spirit of America which is leading the nations in the path of Christian democracy. The latest volume of this class, and in some respects the most striking, is by Professor McKeever, of the University of Kansas, who, in his book entitled "Man and the New Democracy," sets before us a prose epic of surpassing interest. He shows how, after our entrance into the war, we first caught a glimpse of the mighty meaning of the struggle, which, originating in selfish desires for territory and supremacy, developed into a great spiritual crusade, seeking the heart of humanity. He writes: "The leading nations are now entering the age of the great Common Man. . . . A new Master has arisen in the world, and he is to be recruited from the ranks of the ordinary mid-population." Here we find a characteristic passage: "The general-in-chief of the American army, once a Missouri mule-driver; the President of the Nation and the chief international interpreter of the world war, a former humble schoolmaster; the prime minister of the British Empire and one of the most forceful personalities in the world, a Welsh coal-miner; the generalissimo of all the allied armies, one time a plain member of the proletariat. Thus we might support by a long line of evidence the theory that only the Common Man may become the truly great man. . . . The divine right of man is a bright and luring promise."

The business of the world is having a new birth; commercial enterprise is waking to the ideal of service. We have new standards of living, of wealth, of society, and also a new standard to govern our religious life. The old system of individual imploration has given way before the new, which stands for zealous service and for the spiritual advancement of the world. We have grown broader and more democratic in our religion, yet without sacrificing any of the doctrines long held dear. The true religious instinct is awakened, and minor differences in creed and doctrine promise to soften and disappear. Our former conception of loyalty has changed, and we now see "the rights of the world of humanity as paramount to those of any nation." Capital and labor are now seen to be a unit. The problems of parenthood and childhood, and the training of youth, are important factors in the reconstruction now under way. America has acquired its new birth and vision through the developing power of voluntary service.

There is much more in this book to set the reader thinking. The author has some excellent ideas on education, wealth, morals and human betterment, which show him to have given these problems careful study. He believes, and rightly, that the future of this nation will depend largely upon our just comprehension of the fundamental steps toward higher enlightenment, and that our efforts along these lines will be an efficient help in making the world safe for democracy.

Springtime Colors

THE colors in the shop windows seem brighter this year than they ever seemed before. Reds and yellows and purples and greens massed together in a glorious confusion meet the eye upon every side. Women's dresses reflect softly brilliant tints, women's hats are almost barbarically vivid. And at times the women themselves, walking of a spring afternoon on the avenues, are like a flock of gay tropic birds.

Last year the colors in the shop windows were not so bright. Last year the hats and dresses were more subdued. Last year, as the khaki troops swung down the street, the women who lined the pavements were a more somber group. For our nation was at war. But now the victorious troops are coming back again. And as the manhood of a country returns home with the joyous, exhaustless step of youth, the women are arraying themselves in glad colors—in the garments of happiness—in reds and yellows and blues and royal purples.

It was so thousands of years ago, when the triumphant tribe returned to its little village after a successful raid. Then the women put on their loveliest beads and their newest leopard skins; then they dressed their hair with scarlet flowers and great pearls. And now, across the years, we of a civilized race feel the same desire for joyous expression that those women felt. It is a subconscious throwback to barbarism, but a natural throwback.

After the winter time the flowers come to dress the earth in bright colors. They come because the snow and the ice have been conquered by the sun. And, after all, the bright colors in the shop windows are worn for very nearly the same reason.

The Christian Unity Primer

CHURCH Unity has become a theme of nationwide discussion. Not only among the preachers themselves, from bishops and denominational leaders down to the humblest helper, but among the occupants of the pews, it is a constant topic. Even "the man in the street" is giving it thoughtful consideration.

It has been urged upon the Christian Herald to prepare a progressive statement showing the history of the Church Unity movement from the earliest days up to the present time, for the purpose of supplying accurate information in a form which would be available not only for all the denominations, but for the general reader even outside of church circles, in order that all may have a clear comprehension of this great question which many do not now sufficiently understand. With this purpose in view, we have engaged Rev. H. K. Carroll, LL.D., well known alike to both preachers and laymen, who has consulted a number of the foremost advocates of Unity in the denominations, and the result is "The Christian Unity Primer," a small pocket volume of about sixty-four pages, which covers the entire history of Church Unity, and discusses all phases of the subject, past and present. This Primer, which is a compact yet comprehensive catechism, is now ready for publication and will be issued within the next few days. It will be sold practically at cost of production, the object being to give it the widest possible circulation. The price of the Primer has been fixed at 8 cents per copy; 10 copies for 70 cents; 25 copies for $1.50; 50 copies for $2.50 and 100 copies for $4. All postpaid. It should be in the hands of every one who is interested in this greatest of church reconstruction movements. We would suggest that congregations desiring to have their members fully informed, so that they may be able to discuss intelligently the whole question at issue, should take advantage of the opportunity to send in their orders early for the Christian Unity Primer. The Farmer's Boy Who Won SUCCESS in any undertaking depends more upon character than upon circumstances. The youth who makes every failure and disappointment a stepping-stone, and who is willing to learn by experience, is prepared to grasp the right opportunity when it comes along.

Frank Woolworth was born and reared on a farm. All the education he received up to twenty-one was in the district school in winter, and this was rounded off by a couple of terms in a business college. He was man grown when he began his career as office-boy, working the first year for nothing. But he was learning. Then he became a salesman at a salary of $10 a week, which, however, was soon cut down because of his poor salesmanship. In another employ, at similar work, he was reduced for the same reason. But he did not give up; he was determined to be a salesman.

With his first savings of $50 he opened a store on a side street in a busy country town in up-state New York. He laid in a slender stock of goods, every article of which was for sale at five and ten cents. This was his own idea, and it caught on from the outset. People flocked to the store and soon bought him out. It took all the nerve and all the money he had to restock; but pluck won, and after a while his little capital, being turned over and over rapidly, began to multiply. The second store was opened and stocked with five and ten cent wares. The farmer boy had struck his gait. He knew now that he could sell, for the nickels and dimes came in like a flood.

When Frank Woolworth passed away latel was the head of a chain of over 1,500 stores thr out the United States and Canada, with sev England. Paying cash for everything, and rec quick returns in cash, brought him an immen tune. People, when they looked at his crowded lishments, found it difficult to believe that this m of salesmanship had begun business on a shoe His annual overturn in all his stores was con ide over $100,000,000. He had many good quali character, which made him popular with his army of employees. But it will not be by the fortune that he left to others, nor even by the worth Building in New York—said to be not onl highest in the world, but the finest modern ex of Gothic art, and which was built with nickels dimes—that he will be remembered. It was the bination of patient plodding, pluck, persistence alertness of mind, that made the farmer's boy su ful in the battle of life. His career teaches a less the value of small things. He has had hosts of i tors in various lines of business, who would have ventured had he not shown the pluck and ness perspicacity he did. The best of his educa was received in the "College of Hard Knocks," it was that training that put the winning punch i after career.

Our Bumper Wheat Crop

IT IS a matter for genuine gratification, at time of widespread famine and distress throug the world, that the farms of America should yielded a wheat crop of such mammoth proport that all previous records are cast into the sh This bounteous blessing comes when most neede a season of great foreign shortages. Our crop of 000,000 bushels of winter wheat is 278,000,000 bus over last year's yield, and 150,000,000 bushels bi than the record crop of 1914. Should the spring w prove a good average, the total of our American w crop may be easily over 1,100,000 bushels.

There is probably no section of the old world w the people will not be rejoiced to learn of our wheat crop. It will mean life to some of them more senses than one. Our argosies of helpfuln loaded with this good food, will cross the seas to ply the needy nations.

Hunger-madness has been described as the mot of revolutions. With half of Europe fighting hun as well as Bolshevism, here is one of the most effect solvents of such troubles providentially placed in hands. Let us thank God for his magnificent gift.

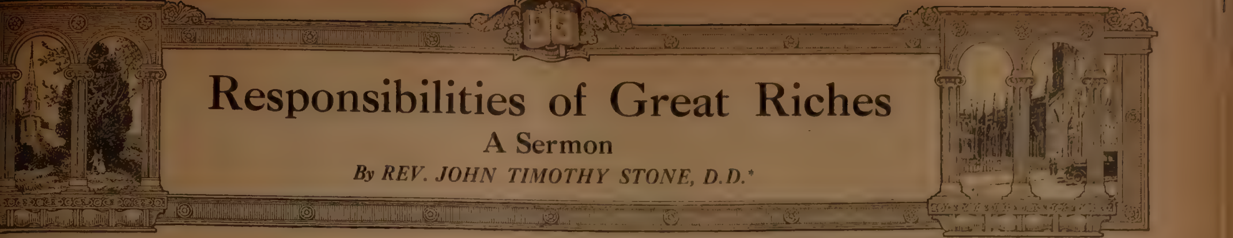
And let us not forget to give honor to the farm who have not only done their best to feed the worl hunger throughout the war, but whose latest crowning achievement may prove to be the bigg factor in allaying the present troubles.

Superfluous Talk

WHEN the poet wrote "An honest man's noblest work of God," he might easily ha added with entire justice, "A modest ma the rarest." Most of us talk too much. Whether t is a purely national characteristic, or something t is the result of our polyglot strain, would be diffic to decide. In any event, we find excessive speech sort of gift which seems to be distributed in wild p fusion on every side. We are apt to neglect the c tivation of that amiable quality of reserve whi imparts to the conversation of the intelligent impressiveness and dignity that we should mo highly value.

Admiral W. S. Sims, the "stern, hard fighter whose achievements in the last two years have add greatly to the glory of our flag on the seas, is a m of plain ideas and simple speech. Since his return has been importuned, he says, by "everybody w wants him to talk on everything," and to give h opinion on all sorts of topics, from prize-fights to t League of Nations. He protests against being p raded as a know-all, and declines to discuss affairs the nation and the world as though he were a walkir encyclopedia. He is simply a plain sailor-man wh having done his duty, wants to report at headquarte and go back to his folks in his own home town.

It would be a boon to society if a few score of ou public men would take a leaf out of the Admiral's lo and stick closely to those topics concerning whic they can speak with real knowledge and judgmen Good, sensible, enlightening speech is rare and ga rulity a poor substitute for sound common sense. Th Admiral is right. Mere loose talk never added to th sum of human wisdom. The wisest are usually thos who talk the least.



Responsibilities of Great Riches

A Sermon

*By REV. JOHN TIMOTHY STONE, D.D.

'EXT —Matt. 19 : 20. "All these things have I ob- 'ed; what lack I yet?"

THIS story of the rich young ruler who came to the Master seeking the inheritance of eternal life is one of the most popular and influential stories of all Gospel writing. Matthew, Mark l Luke all record it. There is a naturalness and derness in the story which appeals to all. The ques- which the rich young ruler sought to have an- ored, the one great question deep down in the human rt, ever remains: What is immortality? What st I do that I may inherit eternal life?

A fellow minister recently repeated the conversation companion seated near him on his journey from lifornia. The man was a noted character in the olic humor of the day and was well known in the ving picture world, but a rough, coarse man. He s telling of a great contract which awaited him in East and how after he had met his engagement would be paid a large amount of money.

"Well," said my friend, "what then?"

'Oh," he said, "then I am going to settle down for ood time and have all the fun that is coming to any n—live on my wealth, and do what I please."

My friend said in reply, "And what then?"

"Oh," he said, "I will do a little work now and then, t with money enough to live on I am going to retire d grow old comfortably."

"But what then?"

"Oh," he said, "I supose I shall grow old and make most of it."

My friend still persisted: "And what then?"

Whereupon the man arose somewhat uneasily and d: "Well, we won't go into that," and he went up o the smoker.

It is the same old question—What must I do to in- rit eternal life? But instead of coming from a care- s, thoughtless spendthrift who had made money sily, it came to the Saviour from a well-to-do young n who was earnest as to his future, who wished to ow the price of service in attaining eternal life. e commandments which the Saviour selected in ply to his question are notable ones. They relate to e rights of mankind; to the order of society; to purity life; to honesty among men; to the protection of e home, and that other great command added which uched the neighborliness of life, and which answers questions of strife, whether among men or nations; Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

The young man had been true to these commands; had lived a consistent life; but something was lack- g. "What lack I yet?" he asked the Master. Then me a clear, specific statement of his sins. The Mas- r uncovered to him the bare, actual tragedy of his e, all unseen and unknown, for it was covered by od deeds and other consistent living. "Go, sell that hich thou hast, and give to the poor; and thou shalt ve treasure in heaven."

THE philosopher of old said: "Not one penny can we take with us into the unknown land." No atter what the wealth of this rich young ruler, it was ot enough to gain an entrance into that eternity of e where God forever dwells with his own. Doctor ohnson once said, "Attainment is followed by neglect d possession by disgust." He might have added, Mere attainment is followed by neglect and mere ossession by disgust."

This young man, with all his rich possession and s earnest life, was possessed by these things, instead possessing them. His attainment was followed by glect, his possession by disgust, and he went away rrowful. The greatest peril of possession is in its ntrol: it controls mankind; it controls us, instead of llowing us to control it.

The war so recently finished is not ended in prin- ple, even if ended in arms. The Great War is not e of physical strife, ammunition and equipment: it a great strife between materialism and principle. hat Germany has failed to do with her arms and er battleships, she is seeking to do now with the mind d with the heart of man, and this has been her policy d philosophy from the beginning. She would un- rmine the faith of the world by the emphasis which e continued to place upon her materialism. There s been no penitence or armistice along this line. She subtle and keen in her determination to undermine e spiritual force of the world in the attainment of e spiritual ideal, by her constant and compelling gument of materialism. In her logic, possession is the aim of life; material accumulation surpassing value of attainment. Possessed by this insane and wicked avarice, she would betray the world by her false philosophy, unconscious of the destruction which she has brought upon herself by its aim and use. She would disunite the nation in creating within mankind individually the selfish assertiveness of personal rights, and would lead men away one from another in an ambition to regulate their own affairs and control their own possessions.

We are not here to assert that the League of Nations has solved the problem, but we are here to assert that a League of Nations, whether this or another, must relate itself to its own problem as it considers the problems of others, for nations as well as men should follow the rule "Love thy neighbor as thyself."

We are living in times of great necessity. The problems of men, cities and nations; the problems of capital and labor; the problems of railroad control, and all that goes with the related problems of transportation and commerce, are entering into the thoughts and relationship of men as never before. Great men must see eye to eye, solving these great problems and discovering mutual benefit one for another. Whether the League of Nations, or a League of Nations, there need be no disregard of the great national rights of individual nations, no disregard of the great independent and related rights of all nations. There is no reason why a League of Nations should interfere with the Monroe Doctrine, or disregard the great primal principles of our Constitution. We must be loyal to the future and loyal to others, as we conserve the noble statutes of the past, and regard with responsibility our own national and individual trust.

THIS even brings more clearly before us our subject. The perils of possession may rob us of the possession of the control of our time. Great Britain has learned many things which we have not as yet learned, just as we have learned many things in which we may instruct her. Among these lessons is that of the strong, able man giving his strength and intelligence to the nation. He must disregard his individual problems as he retires into the larger service, with all his gifts and abilities for the nation.

I well remember, years ago, standing by an English lawn as several elderly men were bowling on the green. I remember one man, of marked personality and apparent age, with his skullcap and his gray beard, as he threw his ball for bowling. His personality and bearing attracted me, and upon inquiring who he was, I learned that he was a great English shipbuilder, but was retired and was now giving his entire time to the interests of the nation. He bowled every day to keep himself in physical trim for the great responsibilities that were his. His possessions were not controlling him, but he was controlling his possessions. He was giving himself wholly to the nation in her great need and in her great problems.

This is a lesson which we need to learn here in America, and which we are beginning to learn increasingly. The great enterprises of our own nation require the ablest thinking and the best minds of our well-trained, mature leaders. As men have given themselves to the great needs of the nation now in working without reward for the government; as men have faced the great issues of the Liberty Loan, the Red Cross, and other national calls; as men have left office and home to take up the great responsibilities in our National City, so men must continue to face the needs of the nation, as well as our own cities and townships, and meet those problems heroically and with great sacrifice of time, giving themselves instead of buying the time of others to meet the great demands of the present.

What if our great cities should find able, strong, striking leaders who would give themselves unsparingly to the great tasks, such as the mayoralty, instead of allowing such leading positions to become the mere wrangling centers for politicians with selfish interests? This must be the standard if we are to attain and overcome the peril of possession in the use of our time.

Then there is the peril of controlling our thoughts, of allowing our possessions in business to control all our thoughts. There are those who think of nothing but dollars and cents. They are wearied when prominent thoughts are brought to them other than those relating to their business responsibilities. They are so weary in mind that they fall asleep as they think of other subjects. The great problems of human relationship, the intercessions of men and organized activity do not seem to interest them; the whole problem of profit-sharing is not a vital issue with them. Thank God, it has become a vital issue to many!

INSTEAD of calling attention with the pessimist or anarchist to the condition that exists, let us remember how much has been done along this line and is being done today. Hundreds and thousands of firms in this country are now engaging increasingly in profit-sharing, and those who are doing the most along this line are advertising themselves the least in such activity. In consecrating thought to others employed by them they are overcoming possession and utilizing their power to overcome this peril.

Then there must be the heart control. We must give ourselves because we love the tasks which are before us. This is the spirit of modern benevolence. We can never love to give until we love those to whom we give and the object for which we give. The rule of the Old Testament was that every man should give one-tenth of his income to the Lord. That legally belonged to the Lord, but there are those today who are disregarding this law of God and wondering why they should consider it. It is worthy of the consideration of all. A Christian man who does not give at least one-tenth of his income to the Lord's work directly in one form or another, is not fair with God! God honors those who thus honor Him. Some men would give vast sums if this were true. I remember an instance when preaching on this subject years ago, a man responded, "Why, if I gave one-tenth of my income to the Lord, I would give tens of thousands of dollars to him every year." He spoke of it as an impossibility; still that man was practically robbing his own best nature by not doing so.

Irrespective of taxation or the modern problems of income, it is nevertheless true that one-tenth of all that one earns belongs to God and should be given to him and to his work. Not the mere meeting of incidental bills in the house of God, but going into partnership with the Almighty and giving because one's heart is right before him. If we love him with all our hearts, this will not be an effort, and a legal amount of one-tenth of one's income will be vastly increased as we augment it and give of our abundance to the work of the Lord.

THE Church of Jesus Christ has failed to realize through her individual membership the great responsibilities which are hers in preparing for the future; in making possible the work of the future by storing up the agencies of money and wisdom to meet the needs of the coming generation. The Church of Jesus Christ is a very central force, from which emanate the forces that work out the great benefits of city and nation. In the church originate the purpose and plans to ameliorate the sufferings of society; to relieve the oppressed; to save the sick and dying. Here start out great hospitals and those institutions which engender Christian training. Here start the great permanent philanthropies which bless society. This is the very center from which have emanated the great organizations and societies which today stand for the betterment of mankind. The church is the dynamo which drives the wheels of philanthropic force all over the world. We must sustain the center; we must subscribe liberally and freely to that which is the heart and head of the whole matter. Jesus Christ discovered for us this truth and made the Church which bears his name the fosterer of his great ideals and purposes. We may have kept the commandments, but this one thing we yet lack, and this is the giving of our goods to feed the poor, and possessing our goods instead of being possessed by them.

No wonder Prescott the historian asked the question when the young miner was discovered at the bottom of the river with a belt of gold around him, "Did he possess his money, or did his money possess him?" Maltbie D. Babcock well wrote, "The only test of possession is use. A lost soul is one that God cannot use and one that cannot use God; trustless, prayerless, fruitless, loveless, is it not so far lost? Thus a man may be dead while he lives."

This young man went away sorrowful; we knew nothing of him; his future was unknown. Strong in personality and existence in life, he failed because he had great possessions which he did not use for God. Instead of vitalizing his wealth, his wealth devitalized him.

There is a joy side to it all. It is not what we have which we ever retain. It is that which we give which lives with us forever, and the great Eternal Life is the life spent in the consciousness of life and possession given away. Thus we are to spend ourselves and spend that which we have, that others may be blessed and that the world may be saved.

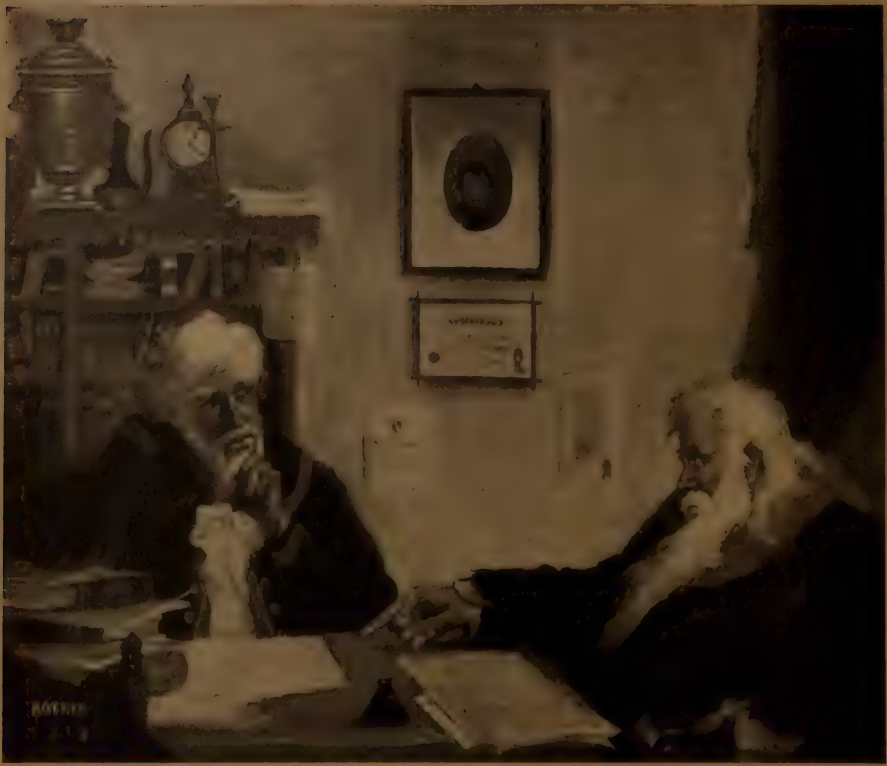
A Timely Tale of Russia and the Red Terror



The old peasant was eying Ossip slyly. Suddenly he asked, "What is the purpose of those figures you keep? Is it that you may continue to report to the old government, as Ivan Ivanovitch says when he makes speeches?"

One Thousand Poods

By GEORGE GILBERT

Author of "King of the Shillibers," "Too Much Elnathan," "A Prophet Not Without Honor," etc.

OSSIP MIHAILOVITCH—Ossip, son of Mihailovitch Dobrosky—sat rubbing his lean, acute nose. Across the table from him was old Poitr Gavrilovitch, who had come in to report the yield of his field of wheat. Poitr held the field from the mir of Mologda, in the province of ——, on the Volga. Dim news of the armistice and probable ending of the world war had come to him, but Russia had other things, nearer, more horrible, and so did not notice what was taking place outside. For Russia, gripped by the Red Terror, was reeling toward her second winter of starvation. But the remote peasants did not know it.

"A poor yield," Ossip Mihailovitch said, rubbing his lean nose again and tapping the table with the end of his penholder.

"Yes," old Poitr mumbled, "there are none to work the land now but the very old, and most of them are sodden with the new vodka the Reds brew. The old vodka was bad enough, and I drank more than I should have. But this new!"

His gnarled hands went up in protest. He fumbled his moth-eaten fur cap that was in his lap. A dog-eared sheepskin pelisse bowed him with its weight deep into the recesses of the stuffed chair.

Poitr was a real Russian peasant; stubborn, industrious in his own misdirected way, honest. It had been usual to report the yield of his field. He was doing it because it always had been done. That there had been two revolutions and a half-dozen attempts at counter-revolt irked him not. It had been done, therefore it should be done.

Ossip Mihailovitch was the grandson of a Lutheran woman of Rossieny, of Kovno. His grandfather, campaigning successfully against Trans-Ural rebels following the liberation of the serfs, had been sent into Kovno to buy horses, and the dashing Captain Dobrosky had won the heart of Stephanie Swensen, descendant of Swedish ancestors who had emigrated into Kovno long before, carrying their Lutheran faith with them. Bringing his blue-eyed, flaxen-haired bride to Mologda, Captain Dobrosky, with the tolerance of the typical individual Russian, permitted her to worship, at home, after her own ways, although of course there was no Lutheran church for hundreds of miles around. Yet, tolerant as he was, the Orthodox Church saw to it that he was never promoted, and he was soon pensioned off and retired and given to understand that it was lucky for him that wounds and decorations preserved him from more severe measures for flaunting Orthodoxy by bringing home a non-Orthodox bride.

Stephanie, dying, left a numerous brood, tinged with liberalism, and several of them became Lutherans upon moving away from the Orthodox-thralled interior provinces. Ossip, in the third generation, was openly non-Orthodox, and this prevented him from rising to a high position, but he was content. Early in life he had been in military service, in Russia's finest regiment. Honored for bravery, he had returned to his paternal acres, which he had taken in whole by buying off the other heirs. He could not attend church except when he was far from home, but he refused to conform to the Orthodox customs, and although he was the man appointed to take agricultural statistics, he knew it was merely because no one else could be had to do the exacting work in that district, not from any goodwill felt toward him in the capital and the bureau to which he reported. His neighbors looked upon him askance when they remembered that he was not Orthodox, while at the same time they flouted the priests when they dared do it. Nevertheless, the people respected the keen-minded, upright dissenter, for he had qualities they were forced to admire: he was exact, just, quick to decide and act. This lone product of evangelical force in the midst of the environing Orthodox throngs was a puzzle to them all.

Now the old peasant was eying Ossip slyly. Suddenly he asked:

"What is the purpose of those figures you keep? Is it that you may continue to report to the old government, as Ivan Ivanovitch says when he makes speeches?"

"It is that I may report to the government," Mihailovitch replied seriously, rubbing his lean nose again. "No matter what government they have in the city of St. Poitr, it will need facts to go on—if it is to go on. True, my little ceased long ago, but I still can find for this little work. Facts about food iron, gold, rainfall, and so on, are the most important tools a gover can work with. A government tha not know what its people produce not serve its people, and a governmen does not serve its people is a nuisance, abolished,"

The old peasant scratched his Plainly this had all rolled off hi like water off a duck's back. He again:

"But Ivan Ivanovitch says that wi Czar gone, the bourgeois republic gon Reds in full control, we are to have the erhood of man, so the people will ne to work hard, driven by threats, st or itch for money. There is to be nice time now there will be enough around and to spare, all without work."

"I do not know about that; all I k that, as I have not been relieved of my it is my duty to gather statistics and them to the proper bureau in Petr Poitr Gavrilovitch. One who has b sergeant in the Preobrajensky regimen not forget what duty is."

Old Poitr blinked his eyes, but h reply ready. Habit of long deference him humble while they were in the room off the Dobrosky library, whe statistician worked. But once outsid Poitr drew in a long breath, square shoulders and lumbered away towar reopened vodka shop at the cross below.

Now it gone . . .

Poitr found Ivan Ivanovitch holding f as usual, in the vodka shop. The fume the fiery spirit, the smell of fur coats on sw bodies, of the cabbage soup that the shopkeeper's had brewed for dinner, smote the old man's nost It was good to be there again, he reflected; good to listen again to the orator. Ivan Iv vitch was the neighborhood hero. He had come h with a thumb off after the early raids of the first sian armies into East Prussia. He had been stra exempt since, drawn a pension until the Czar fallen, held a petty place in the two succeeding gov ments, or at least had received sufficient funds somewhere to keep him going at his regular wo informer and agitator.

Ivan was saying, as Poitr entered:

"While our brothers fight for us, we must them, good people. The demand for another t sand poods of our wheat is not oppressive. T is plenty. If one lacks, another will have enoug equalize the lack. Brinsk is a good wheat distr The barge from Nishni will be here in two d and we must fill it. Do not worry; what with end of peculation by the old government and follies of the other, the economy of the Soviets make our little stores go far, and a ruble will do three did not do before in taxes, roads, river provements, canals—everything. Then, we have police to feed and pay."

And so on. The crowd cheered him, and even Poitr, with a lingering doubt, raised by the thou of the other levies on the district, was silent as s as Ivan's treat of vodka was given him.

"The wheat shall be paid for in new bills. T Soviets believe in printing them new every d so the people will not have to handle dirty mon like that the old government kept going to spr disease and death."

This shrewd hit, to men who had not the faint glimmer of political economy and banking, t Promises were made that the wheat would be for coming, at the landing, in due time. Ivan s went out and toward his home, a small, tumb down place half a verst back from the river, in t midst of a clump of birches. As he neared the pl his swaggering air departed. In the kitchen found a blond giant, in the Red Guard unifor crouched on his haunches before the grate, roast a whole fowl, using his bayonet as a spit.

"Did they promise?" the giant demanded, r oving, however, his gaze from the l, from which appetizing juices were ing.

Yes Dmitry Alexevitch, easily."

le laughed a foolish laugh. The ka had robbed him of some of his ning, but not of his fear of this man, ose nod could cause him to be haled ore the dread tribunal of the Red ror and snuff out his life.

'he gravy from the roasting fowl oped on to the embers and spat im.

It is well—for you," the big Red ard said slowly, dispassionately, as who merely states a fact, "else you gone before the tribunal."

van scratched his head, then ran his it forefinger about the roll of his ar, inside, between flesh and gar- it, in that motion so usual to the min-bitten moujik. The vodka had ddled him, else he had not gone on:

It was easy. But what of the win- ' I have kept rough account. There not be enough wheat for bread here. er crops are scarce; hardly a cab- e or a winter radish laid in store. nsk always had been a breadly dis- t; now we shall lack. And the cows, s, fowls and most horses are gone."

'Look you, Ivan; leave such things igher powers."

'That is what the priest said under Czar. . . ."

'But it is different when I, repre- ting the people, say it. Listen to me, n Ivanovitch. If we take more than can spare now, it will be returned r. There is a temporary need in rograd, to be filled. Afterward we send a surplus from another district here."

van heard so much. Then his head ded forward as he slept, his head on kitchen table, from which Dmitry n ate his roasted fowl—the last of n's flock.

'Bah!" he said to himself, as his th crunched open a legbone to get the rrow from it. "I shall not be sorry move from here. This district is lked dry."

His instructions had been to keep m sight, to spur the local agitator on induce the people to give up their d willingly. Life in Ivan's slovenly chelor hall had been irksome to nitry, who often yearned for the de- hts of Nishni, but the fear of his mas- s kept him to his task. He was im- nsely relieved that the utmost had en wheedled from Brinsk, and without uss, too. As for the people of Brinsk well, that was their lookout. No ubt they had, like the others, food ncealed beyond their needs. Every e in Russia had done that since the r began. And if trouble came, he uld be far away. . . .

Each afternoon Ossip Mihailovitch obrosky rode out along the river bank his little, tough black mare. Next y he came, as usual, to the vodka op, and, as usual, Ivan was declaiming ere, only from the doorway this time: "I am assured that even if there is a k of wheat here, some will be sent in soon as a surplus is found from other stricts."

"Then it must be all right, as we have w the brotherhood of man and the ar is gone," old Poitr said from the ge of the crowd.

"Exactly; you are a good patriot, andpapa. And besides, Brinsk, such fine wheat region, will not miss another ousand poods. We of Mologda are ly a small part of all in Brinsk, and we lack, cannot we get wheat from r neighbors?"

"No, you cannot," Ossip Mihailo- tch called over the crowd to him. he old soldier, his white hair streaming er his bosom, sat steadily on his black are. His coat was well belted in about waist, and he wore the Cossack oots. A hat of fox fur topped his ead. He was not a large man, but be- gn in his expression.

"Be still, Mihailovitch," Ivan blus- red. The precise old official always ad disconcerted him. If 'Mitry had mained, to give him the backing of e Red Guard terror, he would have id something more severe.

"No, I shall not be still," Ossip called. You are a goose, Ivan, and the rest of ou are geese. I am the only man who knows what wheat we have in Brinsk and other produce as well. I know how much you all have said you have, and years of experience have taught me about how much each of you will lie and some of you inform on each other. I have the exact figures, and I told them to you early this morning when you called, Ivan Ivanovitch. What are you lying to the people for?"

"I am not lying; it is you," the bully blustered; "you are one of the old order and are plotting for the return of the Czar."

"You all know I do not plot. I manage my little farm, live on my income, keep the statistics and send them to those over me. That is all. If a government does not know what its people produce and need, it is a nuisance and should be abolished. A government is like a plow. If it will not do the work, it must be cast aside."

"That is common sense," old Poitr called, stroking his beard.

"I agree to that," shrewd Ivan said, catching from the faces near him the force with which Ossip's argument had struck home; "and that is what our new government is doing—serving the people. . . ."

"Do not go from the road like that," old Ossip insisted; "I said you could not send another thousand poods from here and be safe."

"People-hater!" snarled Ivan, holding aloft his mutilated hand.

"Yes, show your hand, from which you shot the thumb to get out of the army," Ossip jeered.

He leisurely turned his horse about and rode off.

Ivan sputtered, fumed inwardly. It always was so. Ossip, with his exactness, figures, fearlessness, daunted the agitator and temporary ruler of Brinsk. He knew the old exempt did not fear him or anything earthly, save being remiss in his exact duty.

"What figures did he give you this morning?" old Poitr asked innocently.

Ivan whirled on the old man like a living flame:

"What, you take his word against mine, the word of a hater of the people against that of a hater of the Czar?"

The old man shrank back in terror. To be denounced by the friend of the people? To be sent before the Terror in Nishni!

Old Poitr mumbled some words of excuse. Ivan readily granted him pardon. Soon, after one of his fiery orations and treating all around, he had them in their usual exalted mood—common through the country districts in those months, when they were willing to give up food, home, their flesh and blood, for the new ideals so suddenly made theirs.

Next day the barge came; the long line of carts came creaking up to the landing, and the one thousand poods of wheat went—went on the Volga to swell the millions of poods collected by force, stratagem and theft; went to swell the great profits of the favored wholesale merchants who were compounding with the district and provincial Red grafters.

And Ivan Ivanovitch, who had planned to sneak away next day to the river, embark there with certain hundreds of rubles of real money that he had pinched together by preying on the people, stole forth at dawn to get into his boat. As he crossed the threshold he stumbled, and the pain in his ankle warned him he could go nowhere that day. Before night his ankle was black. He did not go to the vodka shop that day, and when people came to seek him out next day they found him groaning. He bellowed when a strong neighbor wrenched his ankle into place again.

"I must stay a while yet," he told himself, "but I can go away before they find out."

One thing worried him greatly. Ossip Mihailovitch was right. Brinsk had been stripped, and if the people found it out, he, Ivan, would not be safe. But he did not know the full extent of the disaster.

For here and there, before the milder autumn days ended, faces grew anxious. Whispered queries brought out the information:

"I did not save even seed; the price was so high, and paid in new bills, too.

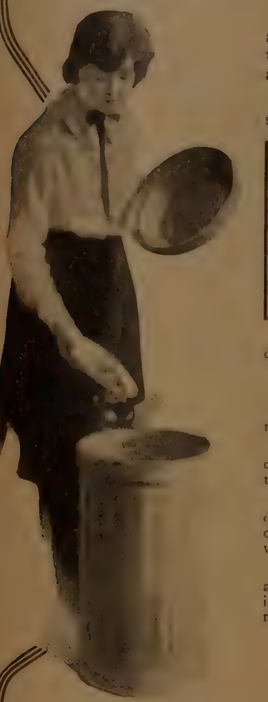
The Dollars We Throw Away



Many foods have slight food value as compared with Quaker Oats. And the reason lies largely in the refuse and the water.

For instance, here are the wastes on some common foods:

Refuse and Water

	REFUSE	WATER
Quaker Oats	None	7%
Beef	20%	54%
Mackerel	45%	40%
Potatoes	20%	62%
Squash	50%	44%
Beets	20%	70%
Canned Peas	None	85%
Canned Tomatoes	None	94%

Note that the waste in Quaker Oats is not one-tenth the waste in any of these other foods.

Another Waste

Another waste lies in buying food without reference to energy value. That is, to calories.

The average person needs 3,000 calories per day. In some foods they cost ten times what they cost in others.

A day's energy need in Quaker Oats costs only 15c. In meat and fish foods the average cost is at least $1.50. In lobster, 3,000 calories would cost $18.

Yet the supreme food is oats. It is almost a complete food—nearly the ideal food. Both in flavor and nutrition there is nothing to match oats.

And this is what they cost per 1,000 calories, compared with other necessary foods at this writing:

Cost Per 1000 Calories

Quaker Oats	[illegible]
Round Steak	41c
Veal Cutlets	57c
Average Fish	60c
Hubbard Squash	75c

That means that ten people can breakfast on Quaker Oats at the cost of one meat breakfast.

It means that each 30-cent package used to displace meat saves about $3.

And it means vastly more in its better nutrition.

And besides, our brothers in other districts will send us from their surplus."

"I found rust in my wheat, the little I saved out. And the potatoes are rotting, the weather has been warm so long."

At times troops streamed through. The uniforms were so worn and patched they could not tell which side the troops belonged to. Often they gave no information of themselves at all. They took food, though; often insulted the older women. The girls were gone, like the younger men, to the towns, lured by higher wages, by agitation of various sorts.

Often as the days grew shorter the people would gather at the landing and scan the Volga for a possible wheat barge. Barges came and went, most of them guarded by troops. Some had cannon frowning over their sides.

At last a committee was sent about the district to see what conditions were. It returned in a few days, gloomy. All Brinsk had been stripped of wheat. Potatoes were rotting; cabbage was rotting. But "wheat was coming back, in good time. And the weather was so mild, that no one was to fear." . . .

The isolation of the people, product of ages of despotic rule that had nailed them to their home soil, kept the old people left in Brinsk from doing anything original. They had but to wait, according to their ideas, for the wheat that was to come. And the new bills were so crisp that who could doubt? They were not dirty, sweaty bills like the Czar gave out. . . .

At times old Ossip, very erect on his horse, rode by. He would ask what they were watching the river for, and they would tell him. He would look grave and say:

"I warned you that that last thousand poods was too much. I told Ivan Ivanovitch plainly so. Do not blame me."

One day he added:

"I am going to kill my horse tomorrow and pickle her. I have killed all the stock on my place and pickled the meat. When you are hungry, I shall divide with you."

Then they were struck to the heart. What he had said had pierced through the clouds of their ignorance and simplicity like a bolt of lightning tearing apart black clouds. He was so exact in all that he did that he would not be slaying his fine black mare for a whim! True, he was a dissenter, but he always spoke the exact truth!

So they began to argue what should be done. Ossip left them and rode off, rubbing his nose with his finger. Finally they decided to go to Ivan Ivanovitch, who was able to hobble about his place with a cane.

"I am well enough now to travel," Ivan said, puffing out his chest; "I shall go by boat out to a barge bound to Nishni and lay your case before the Great Committee there."

"Will wheat come?" old Poitr asked.

"Yes."

They went away, wagging their heads, rubbing their beards.

Ivan's old habit of dominance had returned. Having thought of a way to escape, naturally he felt no more ill at ease. He talked down all who opposed him, ridiculed Ossip Mihailovitch's statistics. And so they went away, wagging their heads, rubbing their beards.

They rubbed their beards because rain was falling and they did not like the feeling of that first chilling rain of late autumn. It felt too much like snow, and they did not like to think of snow. . .

Next morning it was snowing hard. No one went to the landing. At a stroke the people in that end of Brinsk were cut off from the world. It fell intensely cold at night and the snow ceased for a time and every one remained at home. There was little wood in that region; wheaten straw was used as fuel—great ropes of it, twisted, being fed into the thin stoves. Owing to the excitement and politics, little straw had been stacked; it was all sodden under the snow. Most of it had molded and rotted. That first cold night many of the people of Brinsk shivered. And at dawn it was snowing again.

Brinsk was a shut-in community. Roads were blocked, the river like iron, the birds all gone. Now, hastily to know the truth they had dodg people ransacked root bins and bins. If there could have been a n then, dismay would have been s every face. But, worse still, ea to face the facts separately. was at hand. Each house was bound for a time.

Each thinking that a neighbor have a surplus, each began speed work of opening up his own par road. A few, who had animal or old horses, found the task easi did the others. Within two day possible to get about again in th of Brinsk district. But what l the distant swells in other part what lay up and down or acr black, frozen Volga, they did no They of Mologda were as separat they had been on a desert island snow had isolated them!

Ivan Ivanovitch was missed they had dug themselves from that first weight of the winter's snows. Remembering that h promised to go to Nishni and p their cases to the Great Com they thought he was on that e Some said he had caught a p barge, rowing out to her in a bo one inquired after that about him

The vodka shop had its sup vodka, of course. Who ever kne to fail? It was there that Ossip them three days later, most of gathered about, stamping their keep warm, becoming sodden vodka, arguing, wagging their Ossip and his people had dug the to the road after much labor. vodka-seller, Gregorevitch, was to keep them quiet, but they wou heed him, taking his wares despi protests.

Forcing his way through the muscled folk, Ossip went to rear counter or bar. He went beyond out of the back door. He was se for what he soon found—an ax. came in and proceeded method and calmly to smash vodka barr the head. As the first blow fell an first rush of fiery spirits came gu forth, several threatened the ol empt, but he flourished his ax at and proceeded.

"Listen to me," he roared, wh had finished and driven them all into the cold again. "I have told you were all geese to listen to Ivan Ivanovitch. You are geese, for coming here to drink vodk empty stomachs. I know. You a on short rations, and will be on sh soon. You have run away to escap complaints of your wives, who are in scolding you, I told you that thousand poods was too much t them cozen away from you. You pended on cabbages and radishes roots. Bolshevism and Babel PHILIP WHITWELL WILSON thor of "The Christ We Forget a grandson of Jonathan Baxter, great Bible publisher of England. following suggestive paragraphs from an address he made recently t students of the Moody Bible Insti of Chicago:

"It was not enough for Cain and to be born brothers. Brotherhood be born in the heart.

"Noah taught the world that need safety. I rather believe in gospel myself, especially since I had air raids thirty times over my h and picked up shrapnel on my step.

"The people who built the towe Babel said, 'Those old-fashioned e gelical Christians are all wrong. important thing is to get the right s system: salvation by bricks and mo that is what will lead people up heaven.' The tower of Babel failed because there was lack of materia build it, but because the men went strike.

"You see precisely the same phen enon in Russia today—Bolshev idealism, without the power to rea it; an endeavor to get men to be br ers without getting the enmity ou their hearts."

Liberty Loan to Save the World

By CHARLES EDWARD RUSSELL

Noted Publicist and Sociologist, U. S. Commissioner to Russia

OF THE four hundred million people in Europe, it is likely that three hundred million are now proaching the line of acute destitu- on, or are already upon it—or over it. In some parts of Austria-Hungary, lesia and Bohemia starvation has ther begun or is close at hand.

If there is neither peace nor security Germany fed, what will be the conditions in Germany starving?

In much of Turkey the state of the ople is described as appalling—in onstantinople there is acute famine nong all the poor. Reports from the mps of one million Russian prisoners ill in Germany and Bohemia are of a ature not to be printed in a newspaper. can only hint at them by saying that such stories have been told of civil- ed men except of parties of despairing astaways in the Arctic.

STARVING men lose all reason and restraint. We that are comfortable nd well fed always overlook this act; yet fact it remains. We are now kely to have to deal with it in stern ashion.

For just at the time when whole ountrysides are threatened with death he agitations of the Bolsheviki and he devilish energies of the anarchists re at their worst. Give to desperate, tarving, frantic men the promise of lenty and of domination that the Bolsheviki always hold out, and what hall we expect them to do with it?

What recently happened at Munich ught to show us plainly enough if we ave any doubt on the subject. Pinching bellies had a great deal more to do with that outbreak of madness than the machinations of the reactionaries.

Suppose that a hundred million people in Europe get into the desperate state of mind of the people in Munich, and what would come next?

Of all Germans the Bavarians are by tradition the least given to violence and the most to order and method. And here, under the pressure of this fearful thing, they too seem to eat of the insane root and go forth destroying and pillaging, murdering and burning.

Even at the best, even in countries where there is no starvation, men can see plainly enough the signs of unrest and profound dissatisfaction. He must have read history with his eyes and not with his intelligence that does not know that these things are infectious.

IN THIS great crisis there is but one nation in the world that is in any position to furnish the relief that may save the situation. That is the United States. It alone has the food, the textiles, the ships, the money to save the world from an illimitable disaster.

America had last year a bumper wheat crop. There is every prospect that this year we Americans shall exceed last year's record. We had a bumper corn crop. Probably we shall have another. While the war was on we voluntarily rationed ourselves that we might feed the Allies. The present emergency is at least as great as that of the war.

If we undertake for the sake of humanity as much self-denial now as we practiced then, we can give Eastern Europe enough help to help the most of it through to the next harvest.

It rests with us Americans whether we shall grasp the situation and rise to it.

There is no help in any other quarter. We may as well understand that. It is America or nothing. We have in the United States a pleasant and hopeful feeling that the war is all over and done with, democracy safe, and the world slung back to the good old grooves in which it traveled so unctuously in the years before this thing came upon us.

As a matter of fact, the work of America for the world was not more than begun when it went into the war and sent its troops to France.

Democracy and civilization are threatened with a foe even greater than the old German Empire. What is needed now is not guns and soldiers, but wheat, corn, cotton, seeds, clothes.

THERE is not the slightest doubt that the nation that furnished one kind of relief can furnish the other. But to furnish it one hundred and ten million people, thousands of miles away from the scene, must come to know how fearful is the need and how critical is the hour. And can they do that?

The war revealed to us how fragile, after all, is the social house in which we have lived with so much pomp. Old records reveal the story of mankind as a succession of such civilizations rising and crumbling. I should think that if we are not ready to take a chance on the downfall of this one, now is the time to forget everything else except the saving of it.

Food or chaos—that in plain terms is the situation in practically all of Europe east of the Rhine. Help, or have anarchy.

Come with organized relief on a scale never known before, come with bread and meat and clothes for millions and then millions, or face the certainty ot terrible distress over vast regions of populous territory and the possibility of a storm that will shake the whole structure of society. And maybe shake it down.

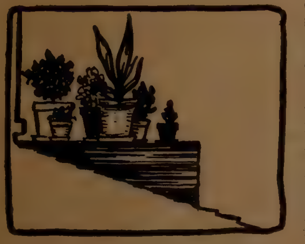
A Shelf for Grandma's Plants

By Laura A. Kirkman

HAROLD'S grandmother was not able to leave her wheel chair by the window, so when spring came she asked Harold if he could think of some way of putting up a shelf on the sloping roof outside her window upon which she might stand her plants.

Harold was always trying to think up new things for his grandma's comfort, and he enjoyed making her a shelf to hold her plants. This is how he did it:

He found a 20 x 20 inch square, coverless, wooden box and sawed off half of each side, following a diagonal line from the upper to lower corner (see diagram). He then painted the box a dark green.



"You see," he explained to his grandmother, "when this box is turned upside down on the roof beneath your window-sill, it will make a nice platform to stand your plants on."

Grandma was delighted. She enjoyed watching Harold nail the box to the sill and they had lots of fun arranging the plants.

Three even furrows, turned at once, make of the farm tractor the most efficient implement on the farm. No matter how hard the ground or deep the sod, the power is always ample

By A. M. MACMILLAN

WE HAVE been called the world's storehouse for food, and are told that the feeding of a large proportion of the population of this small planet depends upon the produce of our farms and fields.

This means the intensive cultivation of every acre of ground available, and entails a moral obligation on every owner of even the smallest parcel of Mother Earth. Our history has shown that whenever an imperative need has arisen, inventive genius and manufacturing ability have combined to produce the solution to the problem. The cotton gin, the telephone, the locomotive and the automobile—all were needs created by the march of civilization and the requirements for food, clothing and the intercourse of a vast country.

And now, at the culmination of the world's food crisis, and with the labor problem acute, comes the farm tractor to work unfailingly twenty-four hours a day if necessary, to replace or supplement from six to a dozen horses and as many men; and to do its work so effectively through increased and more uniform plowing depth, that better and more abundant crops can be obtained from the same acreage with less manual labor. Plowing the roughest ground and the steepest hillsides, harrowing, and cultivating all crops except corn; harvesting, threshing, silo cutting—all can be performed by a single farm tractor which may cost no more than two or three good farm horses.

Let it not be inferred that we are belittling the horse and our debt to him for the progress of civilization. He still has his utilitarian place to fill on the farm, but neither efficiency nor humanity demands that he should be called upon to do the work for which mechanical power is better suited. There are more horses in use today than ever before, but the proportionate increase in numbers has by no means been as great as that of mechanical horsepower. In other words, while mechanical horsepower throughout the country may have increased during the past four or five years by some hundreds of per cent., the number of horses employed has remained nearly constant, or grown by such modest figures as 10 or 15 per cent. But as the wheelbarrow still serves as a useful transportation agent under many conditions, so will a place always be found for the efforts of the horse—both in the city and the country.

Motorists and truck- ave passed through this same stage in the of their passenger car or commercial vehicle, tractor suited to one kind of land, and to vation of certain kinds of crops, may find ncy sadly impaired if set to work in another in which land and crop conditions are ifferent. Whatever failure there may have th the earlier types of farm tractors driven ine or kerosene engines has now largely been e. All of such failures, however, have been eans due to the manufacturers' neglect to his or that part with a view to its proper , for in all fairness the ignorance of er has contributed largely to inefficient ance. The farmer who will give his e best of care and attention will leave his pensive tractor in the field in all kinds of weather without so much as a tarpaulin cover thrown over it, and will allow it to squeak and rattle through lack of oil without giving one-tenth of the thought to such a condition that he would give to a slight lameness of one of his favorite team. But nature will help to restore the ailment of an animal to normal; while mechanism is constantly at war with the elements and needs even more protection than does the human anatomy. There was a time when farmers could afford, or thought they could, to let their machinery stand out in all weathers. When a disc harrow or a mower rusted out they bought another. The land was generous and the margin of profit wide. Now the good farmer who makes money figures against waste and unnecessary wear. He will not feed too many horses, and he provides adequate shelter and care for his mechanical equipment, in which you will find a modern tractor of the design best suited to his needs.

When the average farmer will realize the care that is due his farm machinery, and will bear in mind that the individual problems of the crop and farm can be best served by an intelligent survey of the situation, and the selection—not of any tractor—but of the one which in design, price, and capacity is most nearly suited to his requirements, our land will produce the yield intended for it by nature, and the food required by the starving millions of the world will not be sought in vain.

NOTE—Expert and unbiased information concerning the selection of the best kind and type of tractor for any farm work will be given free of charge to Christian Herald readers by the newly formed Motor Service Bureau. Those desiring such information should give their requirements in detail, and specify the exact conditions under which such tractors will be used. Replies will be made promptly by mail.

All farms cannot be located on level land, but the tremendous reserve power of the gasoline engine makes hillside cultivation as simple as driving a team of horses over a concrete highway

The tractor is a movable power plant, and after its work of plowing, cultivating and harvesting is done, it can run the threshing machine for 24 hours a day—if the market for grain makes such continuous work worth while

WHAT KEEPS OUR FLIERS SMILING

By a Lieutenant in the Army Air Service

ON THE day that peace came to the world, fifty-five military airplanes, in battle formation, flew over Hampton Roads in official celebration. Hundreds of warships, transports and supply vessels far below in the harbor of Newport News whistled their joy, while thousands of troops concentrated near this greatest American port of embarkation paid tribute to the early success of their predecessors in France.

But this is not a story of the nation's victory celebration in which all Americans from the Home Guard marching in Oshkosh to the noisy throngs on Broadway took an equally enthusiastic part. It is an attempt to show how the great American sense of humor proved to be the saving grace of the army aviators who on that day flew over the site of the battle of the Monitor and the Merrimac, and of their fellow fliers who remained on this side during the war. They needed a tonic for their spirits probably as much as the men who flew over the battle lines in France, for they had none of the glamour of battle to offset thoughts of the everpresent possibility of death among them.

In spite of the splendid records of safety at the United States Army flying fields during the war, fatal accidents did happen, and the sudden death of comrades could not fail to affect the fliers. As a general rule at the flying fields there was little "barracks talk" after a fatality, but there remained a subconscious "who will be next?" feeling among many of the men.

It wasn't the Y. M. C. A. which supplied the antidote for this. It was the dear old public, doing its bit unconsciously, by its ignorance of the air game, to divert the thoughts of the airmen.

The rapid strides of aircraft development since the war began, and the military censorship, have left the layman quite ignorant of the flying art. The majority of persons know of the airplane chiefly from the State Fair "birdmen" of five years ago, advertised to do "death-defying loops in mid-air," but usually "prevented by unfavorable weather conditions."

IF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN while absorbed in transforming lightning to electricity ever got as many foolish questions as the average reserve military aviator, it is no wonder he was able to write America's best known axioms on human nature. Thousands of United States Army fliers can testify to the inherent inquisitiveness of native America, young and old, north, south, east and west.

It is the unbelievable march of foolish questions which has kept their minds from morose thoughts of fallen comrades and the unspoken "who may be next?"

The sweet young thing flutters up and lisps: "Oh, Mr. Aviator, what do you put that big fan out front for?" and Mr. Aviator is wont to capitulate.

One brave fellow took an unusually deep breath and replied to a similar question from a similar girl: "Why, dearie, sometimes I go up to the Milky Way, and after churning around a bit, the fan comes down all covered with cheese."

They not only say foolish things; they do them—and all to the unrestrained joy of the aviators.

TO RETURN to November 11. That night the men who flew in celebration of the advent of peace had two pictures in their minds—one typical of the hazards of their occupation, the other of the antidote variety.

First—the signal to break up the formation; misjudgment of one of the fliers; a ship crashing into another, ripping off the latter's tail surfaces and losing its own propeller. Two thousand feet up, and the quick realization that the slightest collision in mid-air, three times to one, results in a fatal fall.

But the other picture caused the fliers to forget the crash: a Ford coupé bedecked with banners and bunting of the national colors describing great arcs around a Virginia peanut field, rocking and throbbing in its course like the convulsions of an indisposed bovine. Protruding from the windows, front, rear and side, the heads of small children emitting terrified shrieks; the whole being a Virginia farmer and his family interrupted on their homeward way, searching frantically for the body they had seen hurled from the sky. Well into the night the search continued, but in vain, for the "victim" they had seen fall was the propeller taking lonely flight earthward after the crash in mid-air.

A flying cadet at a Southern Field supplied the thrill of a lifetime to the population of a small town in southwestern Georgia last summer, and received the fun of a lifetime in return.

After an hour's run one rainy morning, there was water in his carburetor, making a forced landing advisable. Choosing a field two or three miles from the nearest town, he descended. As there was only one farmhouse in sight, the aviator expected to examine his engine undisturbed, but within a few minutes he found he had company by the score. People came rushing to the spot in automobiles, on bicycles, in delivery wagons, and the most unfortunate, on foot. From the town the airplane had been seen descending and the people began without delay to avail themselves of the opportunity of getting a close-up of an airplane.

A local train passing by stopped and added its crew and passengers to the throng. The people crowded around the big bird, looking at it with awe and wonder as though it were some great Martian visitor. But curiosity soon overcame awe and they approached close to the plane, poked their fingers against the wings to see what they were made of and attempted to turn the propeller around "to see what it felt like to crank one of them things."

For the safety of the ship and in accordance with government regulations the aviator made the crowd stand back—ten feet away from the wings—and organized a guard to see that the crowd kept its distance. Choosing four or five of the taller and apparently more authoritative men in the crowd the pilot asked whether they'd mind stepping up and holding the crowd back.

"Mind!" If they had been asked to constitute a guard of honor to escort the President of the United States those men could have been no more puffed up with pride. The honored civilians felt on a new basis of intimacy with the aviator and showered him with questions. They were the conventional ones—whether the plane rocks and makes one seasick; whether it isn't freezing cold to go up so high; and then from one of the men:

"Say, tell me; when you're up there in the air, how far down can you see; that's what I want to know." He was a simple-minded soul, sincere in his questioning, and it was a shame to tease him; but the temptation was too great.

"Oh, about as far down as the ground; usually not any further," answered the aviator.

It was two hours before the crowd diminished noticeably in size, and past noon. Presently from the farmhouse to which the field belonged came the farmer's wife, weighted down with a tray resplendent in wedding-present silver and cut glass and laden with viands which rivalled cook-book illustrations—fried chicken done to a golden brown, corn-meal muffins light and puffy, jam and preserves, everything to delight the heart of an aviator who was, first and foremost—man.

With the dinner as an introduction, the farmer's wife felt entitled to a chat with the aviator. Sitting on a log beside him, she expressed her feelings regarding landing in her corn-field.

"Say, when I saw you beginning to come down and going over that direction a bit and coming back again I just about worried my head off for fear you was going to land over there in Si Decker's cotton field. Why, man alive I wouldn't have had you done that for $50,000. 'Course you kinda broke up this corn field, knocked the corn flat clear from over that fence there so it won't be good for nothing; but it isn't everybody can say they had an airship come and land in their farm, right on their own corn field, and I tell you I appreciate it that you landed here."

GATHERING up the scanty remains of the dinner she started back to the house, while from the road came another woman similarly burdened with a tray—fried chicken again, sweet potatoes and the usual accompaniments. Within ten minutes an auto drove up; the driver produced from under the seat a valise which on being opened proved to contain a picnic lunch; cold fried chicken and more sweet potatoes. By the time the sixth, and fortunately the last, dinner appeared the aviator was convinced that the stories of Southern hospitality and the prevalence of fried chicken were no myths. When the natives had disappeared a well-filled aviator might have been seen surreptitiously feeding fried chicken, sweet potatoes and sandwiches to a neighboring pig.

The original aviation joke—about the man who took a passenger along to get out and crank up if the engine died—is scarcely further advanced than many actual occurrences.

One flying-field visitor had the bright idea of carrying an air-pump, in case of puncture to one of the pneumatic tires, presumably on the sharp edge of a cloud.

Then there was the girl who was certain she had observed an airplane flying backward. The propeller, she said in great surprise, was going ahead of the wings.

And down at Langley Field, Virginia, where the home folks should know better, as it is one of the pioneer government fields, came this question:

"How can you tell where to come down, lieutenant, since you can't see the ground from up there?"

Assured that the ground was visible even miles high—"Oh, you can see the ground, but not with the naked eye, of course. I suppose that's what you carry those cameras for."

BUT some folks believe the aviators and their machines much more capable than they really are. Two fliers were on a long cross-country trip in Louisiana, flying at a half-hour interval. At one stopping-place, the first pilot attempted to land with the wind, overshot his mark, and crashed into a woods. The next pilot landed safely, was greeted by a farmer's wife, and beautifully fed by her. The meal over, and the flier about to depart, friend hostess casually remarked:

"By the way, one of your aviators landed in the woods just over the way a little while ago." Miraculously, the pilot was found uninjured, but still stranded in the tree tops, and his ship a complete wreck.

At Taliaferro Field, Texas, last summer, human credulity registered up to the *n*th degree. A tall wooden skeleton was being erected near the flying-field for eventual use as an observation tower. Construction was delayed for several months, and in that time the aviators spent many idle moments explaining the tower.

One of the victims, whose habitat was nearer the cactus than the cities, startled the local newspaper office one morning with this story:

"Say, I've just found out for sure what that tower they're building out at the field is for. You know them flier fellows that went out in two airplanes about three weeks ago and never come back? Well, they're up there,—10,000 feet up; they ran out of gasoline and couldn't get back. They're starving to death and the other boys are building that tower to climb up and get 'em down. I got this straight, right from one of the aviators out at the field, so I know it's true."

Because youth—and all of the aviators are young—is ever susceptible to the lighter and pleasanter emotions rather than to thoughts of danger and sadness, the mind of a reserve military aviator in the United States flying-field was not beset with the possibility of accidents and sudden death, but was pitched to a happier key.

And for their happiness they can only say: "Thank you, dear public, thank you!"

AMERICAN SURGERY vs. the Witch Doctors of Africa

PULLING teeth in Africa is not the special right and privilege of the dentist; nor is the dressing of wounds reserved for a surgeon of renown. Both these tasks, besides many others, fall to the lot of the Christian missionary, often to one who has never seen the inside of a medical school.

Medical missionaries are few and far between in Africa—one of them serving a territory which contains three and a half million people. But one or two "ordinary" missionaries at every station do dispensary work and give minor treatments, such as those shown in the pictures, to many thousands of people in the course of the year.

Africa is a sick country—one of the sickest in the world. Malaria, tuberculosis and pneumonia fill the swamps and forests with death. The fear of death is so constant a companion of the black people that they have come to consider their native witch doctor as more important than the ruling foreign government or the chief of their own tribe. But once the white man sets foot on the fever trail, the witch doctor might just as well throw away his crazy medicine chest and adopt another profession. In his heart he knows he is a humbug. One of them, accused of this by a missionary, while he accepted the accusation, replied:

"It is my business. There is money in it. I cannot give it up."

Blood brothers to the African witch doctor can be found even in America!

Dr. C. J. Stauffacher, Methodist medical missionary in Inhambane, Portuguese East Africa, vividly remembers the operation which first brought the black people flocking to him. He had successfully removed the cataracts from the eyes of a woman who had been practically blind for seven years. "It is a miracle—a miracle!" cried her husband, when he found what the white man had done. After that the witch doctor's practice began to fall off.

Before six o'clock in the morning Dr. Stauffacher finds as many as fifty people eagerly waiting outside the dispensary. Some of them have walked for days in order to reach him. Others have traveled in caravans of fifteen or twenty. A man who was having his tooth pulled thought, when he arrived, that he had a snake in his ear. Great was his astonishment, after the tooth had been removed, to find that the snake no longer bothered him.

Christian, pagan and Mohammedan, all receive treatment at the hands of this doctor. The Mohammedans who received help from this Christian were so grateful that they gave five gold sovereigns toward the building of his new hospital. The building is now partially erected, waiting patiently for a roof which is long in coming because of the increase in the cost of materials.

FULTON

Eight Months Without a Day Off

Over a period of eight months, with loads running as high as three tons, the Franklin Hardware Company, of New York, has operated its 1½-ton Fulton Truck, without a lay-off of a single day for repairs.

The average daily mileage has been between 40 and 50 miles; the average gasoline consumption, 14 to 15 miles to the gallon!

This Fulton has replaced two one-ton trucks of another make, covering the same ground, and saving costs of gas, oil, and of the extra driver.

Where speed, economy and absolute dependability are essentials, the demand is for Fulton Trucks. Such large fleet operators as Standard Oil Co., Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., Valvoline Oil Co., John Wanamaker, Texas Oil Co., etc., are using Fultons for their big haulage, under all-road, all-load conditions.

The Fulton Triple-Heated-Gas Motor is an important factor in the Fulton low-cost, high-mileage performance. Behind the Truck are the veteran Fulton organization and the largest factory in the world devoted exclusively to the manufacture of a single-model 1½-ton Truck.

PRACTICAL HELPS IN THE HOUSEHO

Cooperation With Your Tradesman

BY LAURA A. KIRKMAN

BUSINESS experts maintain that the friendly relationship between a firm and its customers called "good will" is not only responsible for a high percentage of the firm's profits, but is also of great value to the customer.

This "good will" of business jargon is nothing more complex than plain, old-fashioned, everyday cooperation, and the wise housekeeper is quick to see that if co-operation pays in the great world of finance, it will pay in her own little world of the kitchen.

"If the charge-account customers of a great department store who are known not to be 'kickers' receive a special brand of consideration from the store, why won't I be similarly benefited by meeting the little blunders of my butcher and grocer without irritation?" she argues.

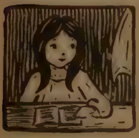
This is logic. It is true that the woman who does not expect perfection of her tradesmen is rewarded by a like "good will" on their part, which bears the fruit of added consideration—just as, conversely, it is true that the housewife who is constantly at war with her tradesmen gains nothing.

Furthermore, a housekeeper who allows herself to become upset over every irritating trifle destroys her efficiency, for irritation distracts one's mind from the task at hand and makes it impossible for one to put forth one's best efforts.

The Schoolgirl's Eyes

WHILE the schoolboy plays baseball and other vigorous games after school hours, his sister finds more interest in sewing for her dolls, or in learning to crochet and embroider.

For this reason, the schoolgirl should early be taught the importance of not straining the eyes by overuse or by using them under poor lighting conditions. She should also be on her guard against using them for either sewing or reading unless the light falls over her left shoulder (see illustration):



Here is a set of rules which should be tacked up in every girl's room: Don't read at meals. Don't sew or read in the twilight. Never face a light when using the eyes at any work. After reading or sewing twenty minutes, lift the eyes a moment to rest them. Never read when riding in any vehicle.

The Emergency Shelf

THE foresighted housewife keeps an emergency shelf, stocked with supplies which will provide a light meal at a minute's notice, or which will "piece out" an ordinary meal in the event of the arrival of an unexpected guest.

Such a shelf should contain: 1 can corn, 1 can boned chicken, 1 bottle salad dressing, 1 can cocoa, 1 can evaporated milk, 1 can tongue, 1 glass preserves and 1 bottle olives.

The can of corn, when turned into a baking-dish and warmed in the oven for a few minutes, will add greatly to a meal which has been prepared for the family only, and which would not be sufficient to set before a guest.

The other supplies mentioned will form a little meal in themselves: the tongue will provide the main dish; the evaporated milk and cocoa powder furnish cocoa; the boned chicken combined with the prepared dressing will make a delightful salad; and the preserves and olives complete the meal.

Household Hints

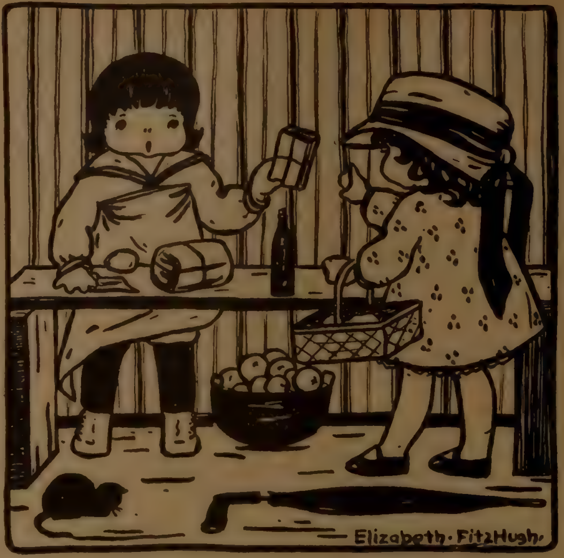
Cream that is just turning sour will whip well if mixed with a little sugar and will not taste any different from sweet cream.

After cleaning pictures, test all the cords before putting them up again and if they are at all weakened put new ones.

If a brick is used for an iron stand, the iron will hold its heat much longer than when an ordinary stand is used.

American women responded nobly to the war appeal to help with farm work, but in England the need was greater and so the response was greater. Over 300,000 English women worked in the fields.

Mirrors are an aid to something besides vanity. Placed in gloomy rooms or dark corners so as to reflect the light from some window or door they will do wonders toward brightening the home.



Playing Store

By ELIZABETH FITZHUGH

HOW do you do, Ma'am? Walk right in. I hope you're feeling well?
O yes indeed, I have a lot of lovely things to sell.

Yes, Ma'am, a hundred cakes of soap; a dozen pounds of tea;
Some bluing and an egg; that's just a dollar thirty-three.

I keep a very honest store. O yes, I have a cat
So mice won't eat the food—you know, we have to think of that!

I'll tie your things with fancy string. You'll carry them, of course?
I'd charge more if I had to keep a great, big, hungry horse.

Good morning, Ma'am. I hope you like the things you've bought to-day.
If any of them don't taste good, I'll give you back your pay!

The Wisdom of Buying in Bulk

BY LAURA A. KIRKMAN

"HOW can you buy so much of one thing at once?" said Mrs. Young Neighbor. "My bills are staggering enough with the scanty ordering I do."

"That's just why they are staggering," replied Mrs. Old Housekeeper; "because you don't buy in bulk. Do you know that you save a few cents every time you buy several cans or packages of one thing at the same time? And it's the penny saved here and there that tells.

"Every fall I buy a dozen cans of salmon, sardines, pineapple, peas and corn," she continued. "If you doubt the wisdom of this, you have only to compute the cost of these cans if purchased singly and then compare the amount with the reduced price I paid for them because I took so many at once.

"And all the year around I buy my cereal, soap, rice, cornstarch, flour, sugar, beans, tapioca and coffee in the bulk whenever the supply runs out, because these are things which will not spoil and so there is nothing to be lost in that respect, while there is much to be gained from a financial standpoint from such buying.

"And here is another little 'tip,' if you will take the advice of an old housekeeper: stick to one tradesman. Tradespeople appreciate fidelity in the customer, and naturally show that appreciation by giving a regular customer their first consideration.

"Another tip," added Mrs. Old Housekeeper, "is that preserve jars of different sizes are excellent for keeping all dry groceries free from dust, dampness and household pests."

It's better to souse the c and down in the water, rather than it, and to wring by pressing rather t twisting.

"In pressing the woolen, remembe must be avoided. The cloth shou almost dry before you begin, and t should be pressed with a moderatel iron on the wrong side of the goods."

Marion Harland Answers

"Would it be practicable and de for the word 'obey' in the marriage s to be changed into the words 'respond to'? I understood that the word 'obey' is often elimin I believe, with most of us, 'respond to' conveys as strong spiritual meaning."—E. E. C. (Colo

In my judgment, a better way out of a diffi that has perplexed hundreds of thoughtful Chri folk was voiced by an eminent clergyman who joined in the holy bonds of matrimony over a sand couples during a pastorate of fifty-odd years. enjoined the woman to be a "loving, faithful dutiful wife." When questioned as to his reaso the innovation, he said: "The women of today neither children nor slaves. I will not tempt the perjury. The point was well taken.

A Penny Saved

THE wise mother gives her child a weekly allow after the age of five years, no matter how s the amount. For, it is only by the actual handlin money that a child learns to save.

The first few weeks that the little allowance is gi the child will spend it freely on small things wi the scope of the amount. But soon the young consciousness will grasp the fact that more expensive purchases require saving; it is then that the toy bank is eagerly given a weekly deposit.

From this lesson to the realization that money in the savings bank will bring happiness later in life is but a step.

The Rock That Is Higher

SUNDAY. Ps. 61:2. "Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I." We can only find our refuge in something bigger than ourselves. Even our home cannot be just our own size or it would become our grave. We must have room to stretch or we shall shrink. If we were never to meet anybody who is most evidently bigger than ourselves, we should speedily suffer from arrested growth. Even my reading must be a rock that is higher than I. It must lift up mine eyes in aspiration and discovery and wonder. If my books are about my own size, if they make no exacting demand upon me, if the food they offer is only soft stuff with never a hard crust which requires thorough mastication, my mental life would not even be allowed to remain stationary, but would pass through swift impoverishment and deterioration. Yes, even my books must be higher than I if I am to rise.

And this is true of everything else, but it is preeminently true of our God. Our God must be bigger than ourselves or our religion will be a petrifaction. But the deadly peril is that in our everyday working thought of God, he is often no bigger than ourselves. He is not a great Being to be looked up to and to be greatly worshiped. He is more of our own size, on our own level, a Being to be looked at and not to be revered. "Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as thyself." That is the real danger, not so much in theory as in practice. We act as though the Holy God were just like ourselves. And so there arises a flippant intimacy which we foolishly regard as freedom. We take liberties with God and call it liberty.

There will be no depth in our life while there is no height in our vision. Our prayers will move among lesser things until we gaze upon the unutterable glory. And here we can be mightily helped by the inspired Word. Let us take some great passage of Scripture where the glory of the Lord is revealed. Let us read it very slowly. Let us linger before the heavenly treasure. Let us fix our eyes steadily upon the glory. Let us kneel before it. Let us look up and pray! I am now before the Rock that is higher than I. And such a prayer could not be thoughtless. It could not be filled with trifles. Even before I begin to speak in audible prayer there will be an enlargement of aspiration and desire. Worship will be ennobled. "Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised." I should enter into this Psalmist's secret, which is the secret of the Lord.

"Because Ye Ask Not"

MONDAY. James 4:2. "Ye have not, because ye ask not." Seven short words, every one of them a monosyllable but one, and yet what a wealth of meaning is wrapped up in them! They contain the secret of the powerlessness and poverty of the average Christian, the average minister, and the average church—neglect of prayer. "Ye have not, because ye ask not." Prayer is the key that unlocks all the storehouses of the infinite grace and power of God. The reason that we know so little of this grace and power in our own lives and in our work is because we so seldom use the key and enter the storehouses of God's grace and power and help ourselves to what God has provided for us there. All that God is and all that God has is at the disposal of prayer. Prayer can do anything that God can do, and as God can do anything prayer is omnipotent. "Why is it," many a Christian is asking, "that I make such poor headway in my Christian life? Why have I so little victory over sin? Why do I grow so slowly in the likeness of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Cl God answers in the words we are ing, "Neglect of prayer. You ha because you ask not." "Why many a minister is asking, "that so little result from my ministry? are there so few conversions? W there so few accessions to my cl Why are the members of my chu little helped by my ministry?" God answers in the words befo "Neglect of prayer. You have n cause you ask not." "Why is it," churches and ministers are asking, the church of Christ today makes slow headway in its fight agains against error, against worldliness, a all the forces of evil?" Again Go swers in the words of the passage, " lect of prayer. You have not, be you ask not."

arrying Religion to Victory

RIDAY. Matt. 12 : 20. "Till he send forth judgment unto victory." ine suggestion is found in Moffatt's translation. There the verse reads ill he carries religion to victory." er all, Jesus is the great victor. His tory was like that of the mustard d, at first unnoticed and ignored, but last growing into a tree in which all tions find their shelter. Consider the stery of the power of the mustard d! You select it, you plant it in the und, but all the chemistry in the rld cannot make it germinate; never- eless, because of the seed hidden away the mystery of God, it pushes aside e clod, it buries itself in the ground, comes out into the light, and it claims e victory. So is it with the mystery the Gospel. Jesus put a new heart to life. He invested men with his own irit, and men thought differently, ed differently, died differently, and timately conquered.

In the midst of this new condition of world affairs there is only one voice that speaks clearly. To many of us it seems that this is the only way left. All other paths have been tried, and they have led down to the gates of death. It is dawning upon us very gradually that it is about time the social order and national politics tried Christ's way. We have tried his way in individual life, and in the lives of thousands and millions of men he has carried religion to victory.

What the nations of the world need is to be invested with a new spirit and to surrender to the mastery of Christ.

Against the background of our social failure, our national problems, the ineffectiveness of much of our church life, we must enthrone him, and again dedicate ourselves and our church to him and to his gospel, believing that he, and he alone, can carry religion to victory.

The Abundant Life

SATURDAY. John 10 : 10. "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." Jesus Christ is the life of the world. Christianity is the religion of life. The Bible is the Book of life. All the themes of Christian thinking are in terms of life. Jesus is the resurrection and the life. He conquered death. There was no tomb that could hold him, and there was no stone the angels could not roll away. The Christian does not fear death, for to the Christian life is continuous, everlasting, abundant. Death is not a division between a here and there, a now and then, a present and future. Death is an incident, interruption, happening along the pilgrim path to God. "Death is the last great adventure, why fear it?" said Charles Frohman on the deck of the sinking Lusitania. "Death is the last open door," writes Hugh Black. It is a passing over the threshold of this our earthly tabernacle to the house of many mansions. As Emily Dickenson so quaintly said: "Death is the porter of my Father's lodge, letting down the bars so that the sheep may enter, their bleatings and wanderings at an end." Jesus deprived the grave of its victory and extracted the sting from death and conquered man's last enemy.

"Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." The Christian theme is not only life, but victorious life. It is victory in the world, over the world, and beyond the world. The Christian does not go down into the valley of the shadows alone. There is One who goes with him. He knows the way through the mists and the shadows, and will lead to the path that winds up to the hills of God. He is the Great Companion. He is Life Eternal.

The Pleasure of Giving

IF YOU looked at our pass book showing remittances turned over to the treasurer of the Bowery Mission you would find the following entries:

"Private J. L. C., Medical Corps, 13th Infantry, Barracks No. 6, Thirty-Sixth Street and Fourth Avenue, Brooklyn. Dec. 27th, $5.00; Jan. 10th, $3.30; Feb. 9th, $3.35; Mar. 12th, $3.30."

Once a month this quiet-mannered soldier comes into my office, lays some money on my desk and starts to walk off. I always have to call him back so that I may thank him.

After he left this morning I kept looking at his money and the thought came to me; Who and what is he? Where does he come from? Why does he use this money in this way out of his meager salary, instead of spending it on pleasure? And suddenly I realized that this is his pleasure.

Substitutes for the Saloo

By REV. CHARLES STELZLE

WORKINGMEN may inaugurate "no beer, no work" campaigns because something for which they have been paying and which they sincerely desire has been taken away from them, but they will never write letters to the newspapers or hold mass meetings making a demand for a saloon substitute.

This does not mean that they do not need a saloon substitute, but they feel that the social features of the saloon went along with the price of the glass of beer for which they paid.. To them the beer and the social features are one and the same thing, and the bitterness of workingmen in the prohibition discussion is less that they have been deprived of their beer than that they have been deprived of a center in which they can give expression to their social life.

Quite a good many articles have been printed recently expressing the opinion that substitutes are not needed—that workingmen now remain in their homes or go to their lodges or go to the movies with their families—all of which is more or less true. The fact is, however, that there is an urgent demand for places in which workingmen in particular may hold their labor union meetings and in which they may discuss the social and economic problems which are today confronting them.

In many of the "dry" States earnest people in the churches have tried to establish "saloon substitutes," giving publicity to this phrase, with the result that these centers have been very poorly patronized and the church people have therefore concluded that there was no need for the kind of an enterprise in which they had engaged—and they are right in this. Workingmen are not eager to be patronized either by church people or by any one else. It also is true that the average American workingman will largely solve his own social problems—he has always done it. He did it when the saloon was here—that is, he simply appropriated the saloon for his own purposes, and to say vindictively or otherwise that "the saloon had been the club of the men it had made" isn't very good reasoning, because it assumes that every man that ever patronized the saloon was a "bum"! This isn't true—as those who have frankly studied the saloon question know full well—any more than it is true that all those who drink beer or cocktails are necessarily people of low character, and, furthermore, it is not any truer than the statement that all saloonkeepers are low-browed brutes. Neither workingmen nor people of any other group would be particularly attracted by men of this character. The dilettante effort of a few faddists to establish coffee-houses for the poor workingmen which failed must not be the criterion upon which to base any argument for or against any kind of a saloon substitute—excepting the kind which they conducted, which for the most part was a mighty poor sort.

Somebody recently foolishly said: "No one wants a substitute for Spanish influenza or for the bubonic plague. No more does the saloon need a substitute."

It would be absurd to insist that the saloon never served any good purpose. It is true that the good in the saloon was outweighed by the evil that was in it—but there was good. The fact that the saloons are closed does not necessarily prove that the needs of the men who formerly patronized them no longer exist.

What is it that makes the saloon so attractive?

First, there is the perfectly natural way in which the saloon is conducted. There's nothing strained about it. Men aren't made too welcome. Few restrictions are imposed. Those who conduct the place make themselves as inconspicuous and as unobtrusive as possible. They believe in the saying "I must decrease, while my customer must increase." Those who patronize the saloon usually have nothing special done for them. They pay for what they get and they do it cheerfully—often hilariously. There's a spirit of dem about the saloon which is tremen appealing. A five-cent piece pla average man upon an equality every one else in the place.

The saloonkeeper himself is a in the problem. His cordial gr his neat appearance, his large ac tance, not only with the men i community, but beyond, his su sources of information, make him a influence. Often he secures w both the workingman and his ch He loans him money without setti the "work test" of the charity o zation societies. No questions are as to whether or not the recipient serving; frequently he lends, " nothing in return."

This is part of the general bu policy of the saloon, which depen largely upon the spirit of good-f ship which must be of first impor in the successful conduct of the prise. The saloonkeeper underst human nature. This is his chief sto trade. It is his business to attract and to so attract them that they continue to make his place a perm rendezvous. He seeks to secur much transient trade as possible, b chief dependence is upon the men come day after day and night night, bringing their friends with t It is the treating habit that make saloon business pay.

Comparatively few—excepting t conducting the lower kinds of saloo will permit a man to become intoxic in their places; they will not p swearing, indecent stories are pr ited, no gambling is allowed. Man their families are in the churches, only in the Catholic churches b the Protestant as well. None treat preachers more cordially than th loonkeeper when the minister mak pastoral call. In short, the sa keeper is decidedly a human being, this must be taken into account in d ing with him.

It is these good qualities in the sal that makes the provision of a substi necessary. If the saloon were enti evil, there would be no need for a stitute.

But let it be said with all the em sis possible—there is no one institu that could be reduced to blue print specifications which will comple answer as a substitute for the sal The best one can do is to discover existing agencies those features w were formerly found in the saloon o organize new agencies which will sup them.

It is undoubtedly true that the mo picture house is the best saloon sub tute in existence, and it is because liquor men have found this to be a that they have fought the movies vigorously.

When saloonkeepers organize to f motion pictures it is a sign that the ture shows are either very bad or very good—either they are so much worse than the saloon that eve saloonkeeper cannot stand for them else they are so much better than saloon that they threaten to injure saloon business. There is no doubt t the latter is the actual situation.

The motion picture house posses many of the virtues of the saloon practically none of its vices. Here found the free, normal atmosphere which the average man is accustom He comes and goes as he pleases. doesn't need to dress up to go to movies. He may take his family alo with him. And instead of having headache the next morning, as he pro ably would have had he patronized t saloon, he has been given a larger o look on life—providing, of course, th the film was of the right sort—and t is purely a question of interest and lea ership on the part of those maki themselves responsible for seeing th only the best pictures are shown in t movie houses.

Using the bar fixtures with the pla glass, rail and all, the old saloon may converted into a restaurant in whi be served the kind of food work- n like to eat and where they may if they wish or play games, read papers, use the telephone and se- information regarding jobs and all matters of personal interest.

well-set-up soft drink parlor and d room combined may be success- conducted and no doubt many sa- will be so used when they are l—either in the small town or in ig city. Probably the same men onduct them who ran the saloons. oons are frequently used as bank- places. Here workingmen have pay checks cashed because there is ere else to cash them. It does not re much of an investment to con- a banking department in an in- ial community. No doubt the oyers of labor would be very glad operate in this kind of an enterprise.

unging- and rest-rooms are very tial features of a saloon substitute. e should not become loafing places, t is sometimes desirable in the aver- vorkingmen's community for work- en to have places where they may their fellows in an informal fashion quietly and read without noise and rba uch may be made of music. It not be very elaborate. Possibly a phonograph will answer every re- ment.

present there are very few places e men may go to enjoy the privi- of a shower bath and swimming . Workingmen do not naturally r filth. They will be clean if given ance. While the Y. M. C. A. pro- s such places, the former patrons of aloon and those who patronize the M. C. A. haven't very much in com- , largely because of differences in l opinions rather than because of rences in social habits.

ormitories for workingmen are very h needed—especially during the er season. The cheaper hotels h are conducted so successfully in e of our larger cities should be dupli- d in every industrial center, with le provision made for reading- ns and general social purposes. h hotels are especially useful for the isands of homeless men who now spend their nights on the streets or in the back rooms of saloons because there is no other place to which they could go.

The schoolhouse is one of the best saloon substitutes. Schoolhouses belong to the people. They have a right to use them, in spite of the technicalities upon which trustees and other governing bodies sometimes deny their use to the masses. School buildings may be used in many ways. One of the good things about them is that their use appeals to the entire family. Indeed, a schoolhouse may more easily become the social center for the community than any other established institution which one may find in the ordinary city. It should not be very difficult to keep the buildings in such a sanitary condition as to make them usable during the day for the children and for their parents during the evening. In many cities evening lecture courses are provided in the public schools. These are of a popular character and appeal even to the uneducated among working people.

During the summer season when outdoor recreation is required public parks may serve as saloon substitutes. But such parks should contain features which will make them the actual playgrounds for the people, and these features should furnish organized amusement for adults as well as children. In cities which are located on water fronts recreation piers will be found exceedingly valuable.

Open forums may be conducted. Labor temples operated by workingmen themselves should be encouraged. There is much value in the use of the drama for the people. General social centers in the average community should be conducted by the city because, very frankly, private philanthropy is spasmodic and often has not the measure of support which will make it effective. When the city conducts such an enterprise the element of patronage is eliminated, because the average man would look upon such an institution in the same way in which he regards the public school which his children attend. He feels that to a degree, at any rate, he is a taxpayer, and that he himself is helping to maintain the enterprise in whose benefits he is participating.

This Cake—

is made from the only coconut canned in its own milk

IT is the milk in the Baker can that makes this coconut cake richer and better than other coconut cakes.

For the Coconut Milk is the only successful guardian of the rich flavor of the fresh nut. This Milk keeps the meat in the Baker can moist, crisp, and tender. No other ready-grated coconut has this supreme flavor of the newly picked nut, for Baker's is the only coconut canned in its own milk. Remember that word "only."

Coconut Layer Cake

½ Cupful of Baker's Fresh Grated Coconut	½ Cupful of coconut milk
½ Cupful of butter	2 Cupfuls of flour
1 Cupful of granulated sugar	2 Level teaspoonfuls of baking powder

Objections to League

By WALTER EVANS EDGE

U. S. Senator-elect from New Jersey

THE nation is beginning to realize that the signers of the round robin in the Senate were not opposed to the principle of a society of nations, but mainly to the confusing form of the covenant and its various interpretations and the precedence it was taking over an agreement on actual peace terms, so universally desired. Now that neutral nations are pressing for clear establishment of national sovereignty and the peace conferees are considering certain other revisions covering in substance the word of protest and warning that came from America, it will be seen that the nation-wide debate in this country was very helpful. It is well to have had the conflicting views aired, clearing up the misunderstandings, before the document reaches the Senate for ratification.

Everybody favors a compact of nations to secure the peace obtained at so great a cost, but it certainly is becoming more apparent daily that there are certain safety-valves which must be placed in the covenant before it will be accepted as satisfactory by the American public. These may be specified in main part as follows:

First, national sovereignty over national economic development, including international relationship in trade and commerce, which must be guaranteed to the end that dictation by any nation or combination of nations as to the limits or policy of economic development in any given nation shall be impossible so long as discrimination is not practiced. This, of course, would include the question of immigration regution.

Second, preservation must be assured for the Monroe Doctrine, at least to the extent that the present policy affecting the territorial integrity of the Western Hemisphere and the guardianship over that policy by the United States shall not be impaired.

Third, the covenant, while strongly binding the United States, along with other members, to assume its full share of responsibility, financially and morally; in settling peaceably all international disputes and in policing any part of the world where the presence of an armed force is deemed necessary, must, nevertheless, clearly set forth that the United States shall not be obliged to send her citizens across the seas into battle on order of any foreign nation or nations in a purely local disagreement, or unless the peace of the world is jeopardized.

If the covenant already contains such guarantees, as claimed by some, it will be in the best interest of a permanent and swiftly attained peace to have it so stated in plain language. By a compact of nations where, to a great extent, each renounces its right to be the judge of its own position in international difficulties and submits to the arbitration of combined and largely disinterested judgment, chances for misunderstanding must be reduced to the minimum, and I sincerely hope the covenant comes to us in such form that it can be ratified unanimously. Whether the covenant is a part of the peace treaty or otherwise seems to me relatively unimportant, especially so if both covenant and treaty represent the kind of peace the American people want written.

By KNUTE NELSON

U. S. Senator from Minnesota

NEARLY all the Republicans are in favor of a League of Nations to prevent War; but there are many who do not like the tentative Constitution submitted by the President for the government of the League.

Two chief objections made are: One is that the Constitution of the League would prove destructive of the Monroe Doctrine, and the other is, it would deprive Congress of the power of declaring war and would make our government in that matter the servant of the League instead of Congress.

There are other objections, but these two are the most serious, and I take it if you carefully consider it, you will come to the conclusion that these are serious matters and should not be lightly disposed of.

Open-Air Evangelism Pays

THE fourteenth annual report of the Evangelistic Committee of New York City shows that the work of the past year was the largest in the history of the committee. It is planned to make the 1919 campaign even more far-reaching. The return of our soldiers from overseas makes the time particularly fitting for a widespread evangelistic appeai.

The report gives some interesting examples of the effect of the work in terms of human life. There is a paragraph telling of a Hungarian woman who was so impressed at an open-air meeting that she promptly stole a Bible in Hungarian. What she read there prompted her to confess the theft and to accept the Gospel message. Then she was given a Bible of her own. Another case is that of an anarchist who tried to break up a meeting last summer. He couldn't get away from the message given by the preacher, and, instead of breaking up the services, his anarchy was badly fractured and he is now a church member and a speaker himself. At another preaching center, a thief and gangster was in the audience. He had not handled an honest dollar in twelve years. He had been in prison and had lost wife and children. He came under spiritual conviction and is now living a Christian life. Two ex-pugilists were also among the converts. The report is full of such stories as these.

There was a total of 3,303 evangelistic meetings in 220 centers during the year, with addresses in nine languages, and with an aggregate attendance of 630,378, an increase over the previous year of 722 meetings, 66 centers and 29,721 attendance. In the work with children, there were 193 meetings and total attendance of 45,000. The receipts for the year were $28,862.78, and expenses $30,914.48.

The opening spring rally will be held on Monday evening, April 28, at Carnegie Hall. The chief speaker will be Dr. John McNeill, the Scottish evangelist, who will preach in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church on April 20 and 27. The Billy Sunday choir will lead the singing. All inquiries should be addressed to Dr. Arthur J. Smith, general secretary, 541 Lexington Avenue, New York City.

A Noted Singer at the Bowery Mission

ONE evening recently 500 men of the Bowery, gathered in the auditorium of the Bowery Mission, were entertained by Eleanor Patterson, the noted contralto, Arma Senkrah Milch, violinist, Frederick C. Martin, pianist, and Florence Turner-Maley, one of America's foremost composers. Miss Patterson has for some time made it a rule to give a concert for the entertainment of the audiences gathered at the Mission, among whom are to be found many men of culture and refinement, who have drifted to the Bowery sometimes through drink and other forms of dissipation, and sometimes through no fault of their own, and to whom the Bowery Mission means home, hope and guidance to renewed manhood.

The twenty-two songs by Miss Patterson, the violin solos by Miss Milch and the compositions by Mrs. Turner-Maley were as fully appreciated by the Bowery men as they would have been by the audiences of Carnegie Hall or the Metropolitan Opera House—not alone for their artistic merit, but also as evidence that the great truth of human brotherhood was felt by the singer, who has become a sort of "big sister" to the men.

Many Help Famine-Stricken India

other Remittance of $15,000 Cabled to Our Bombay Relief Committee

RESPONSES to the Christian Herald's appeals in behalf of the India Famine sufferers are multiplying. A wide wave of sym- y is spreading through the churches America. During the week the stian Herald cabled to Rev. R. A. ie, of Ahmednagar, India, chairman he Relief Committee, another re- ance of $15,000 from contributions, g the third remittance, making the to date $30,000.

r. Hume, as chairman of the All- a Relief Committee, has planned work on a broad basis, which in- es sufferers in all the districts in h the combined influenza and fam- are exacting a heavy toll, especially ng the laboring population. He es from Ahmednagar, under date of uary 19, in terms that would seem ondent save for the hope of further from America, which did so much for a in former famines. His letter says:

Please thank your readers for their , cabled for famine relief by your t newspaper. The Christian Her- Relief Committee has made from e gifts grants to sixteen missions in tern India, including the missions ev. C. W. Thorne and H. T. Vod- and Mr. Fuller's Christian Alliance. grants enabled the sixteen mis- s to do some very urgently necessary f work. Since the gifts came, how- , the famine situation in India has dily grown more and more serious. I have been an active administrator hree serious India famines. But I k with restraint when I say that in y-five years of mission service I have er known a time of such painful eco- ic distress as the present. Not were the rains of the last rainy sea- on which India depends for the luction of food, very insufficient in ny parts of the country, but several ses have combined to make the cost rain very much higher than in the est days of the worst famine. One se was the war; another cause was vy exportation of grain to Mesopo- ia and the West; another was the serious epidemic of influenza. In political division which supplied ut 100 recruits for the war, over 00 persons died from influenza alone. 1917, in the Marathi Mission of the erican Board, only 88 out of 8,592 nmunicant members of churches died n all causes; but in 1918 there were communicant members who died, tly from influenza. This dread ca- ity has taken off many bread-win- s, and left helpless widows and chil- n without means of support.

In many parts of India ordinary ins cost from three to four times as ch as in the most trying days of the st famine. All that the government India can do is to open relief works which enough money can be earned keep soul and body together. The lic is raising charitable funds which ewhat supplement government agen- . But it is absolutely and urgently ded that missions should supplement ernmental and other agencies. Ev- one thinks that (1) missions should east keep alive their armies of work- ; (2) the pupils in their boarding ools; (3) the widows and children of hful workers who have died from the urge of influenza; (4) should receive their care a goodly part of the tens thousands of Christian and non- ristian orphans who have no one else to care for them; (5) by small grants should help thousands of distressed people to go to government relief works, and keep them alive for a few days, till they earn their first money on those works; (6) should try to give some kind of unskilled labor to persons who for some good reason cannot go to government works; (7) should enable doctors and nurses in missionary hospitals to care for their increasing number of patients; (8) should supply clothing to tens of thousands of nearly naked women, children and old men.

"Even today, thousands of faithful pastors, preachers and teachers with their interesting families have hardly half enough to eat; tens of thousands of feeble folk, and of children who have lost one parent or both, have no one to look after them except missionaries; and most missionaries have practically no money for famine relief.

"The Christian Herald Famine Relief Committee, of which I am chairman, and in behalf of which I have been cabling and writing to you, was appointed by the Bombay Presidency Representative Council and the four persons who first composed the Christian Herald Famine Committee; with whom are associated four representatives of other provinces, viz., Dr. J. C. R. Ewing to represent the Punjab, Bishop Westcott of Chota Nagpur to represent Northeast India, Mr. B. H. Backhouse to represent Central India, and the Bishop of Dornakal to represent South India. I am the chairman of this amalgamated committee while I remain in India. In April, when I go to America on furlough, some one else will be appointed in my place as chairman.

"With very warm thanks to the Christian Herald from many missionaries and Indian Christians, I am gratefully yours,

"[signed] R. A. HUME."

F. B. Whisler, superintendent of the Pentecost Missions, writes on February 22: "During the famine of 1900, which deeply stirred America, rice never sold in this district (Raj Nandgaon, C. P.) at higher than eight measures (about sixteen pounds) to the rupee; but this famine being much more widespread—reaching from Madras to North India, and from Bombay to Calcutta, or nearly—rice now sells here at four measures to the rupee, or double the price then. We have only been able to place about sixty dollars to famine relief until now, fifty dollars of which came by last foreign post. One station used up its portion of this in two or three days. Instead of giving outright, we provide work, which is better for the people and discourages begging.

"It was reported here a few days ago that two men had killed and eaten their children. Thieving is also the worst ever known in these parts, the people being desperate and more hardened than in former famines. Already several children have been rescued who must be provided for, having no regular supporters as yet. No doubt these will number scores within the next few months.

"All the Indian preachers and helpers will have to be assisted throughout the year, as we cannot hope for much improvement in conditions until the rice is threshed next January."

Man Made in the Image of God

The Dignity and Worth of Man

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

AT THE very beginning of our glorious Biblical literature is the story of creation, wherein is clearly stated God's high purpose for man. God prepared all the universe for him, and man is its climax and goal. When he appeared it was to have dominion over all that God had made! There at the very beginning is man's dignity and worth emphasized. Man is indubitably God's creature. The lowest statement of his duty is that of servant of the Most High. But to the spiritual mind he is not less than God's child, his chief delight above all lesser, because merely material, things. In him God breathed his own spirit. In all the immensities of the universe the highest response to God that we can find comes from the human soul. There alone is seen God's image and likeness in the purposeful, conscious possession of a mental, moral and spiritual life.

Jesus' Reemphasis Upon the Value of Personality

Many, many things dim the image of God in man and fog our consciousness of his true and intrinsic worth. Poverty and ignorance repress the developing spirit, disease handicaps and disfigures lives, war cheapens and degrades the place of the individual. But above all, sin and moral failure actually defile and denature the divine likeness. Yet Jesus could see the almost obliterated image of God in the most degraded, and found divine values in every child of man whom he encountered. He taught us with a new power of conviction that God sees and cares. He restored man to his place as God's child. He drew out new confidence in the Father's goodness. If we are God's children our first privilege is that of absolute confidence in the beneficence of our Father's purpose toward us. If he gives bitter medicine it is for our truest welfare. If he withholds sweets, it is that we may not be weakened and seduced. In Jesus' conception of the value of human personality we find ground for a new and exalted doctrine of the providences of God—if he thinks men of supreme value, he will suffer no final evil to befall; nothing can really hurt us, "all things work together for good."

Just because Jesus thought so much of man as God's child, he considered the sin of despising the least of us almost unpardonable. He condemned the Pharisee who depreciated the struggling, toiling, sinning multitude and arrogated God's care to himself alone. He denounced unsparingly the exploiter of the poor and the abuser of childhood. He pronounced his woes upon the dogmatic theologians who so readily classified their fellow men as lost souls, while he demonstrated that in the matter of souls "lost" means not found yet, and lays the compulsion of seeking and saving upon the true children of God.

Loyal followers of Jesus Christ have been notable exponents in every age of the dignity and worth of the human spirit. They have given their precious time and energy and laid down their very lives for the poorest and weakest children or the most primitive and unlovely savages, just because they saw in them the immortal souls which alone are capable of communion with the Father both here and hereafter. Without the highest appreciation for men there could be no genuine missionary passion, no worthy evangelistic zeal.

The Psalmist's Wonder

One of our Biblical selections is the Eighth Psalm, where the shepherd out on the hills at midnight ponders in such a lofty yet humble mood on the mystery of God's singling out man from the immensities of the universe for honor and dignity, power and communion. Jesus pointed the real reason; because God is not a lonely, self-contained, isolated Ruler, but a Father seeking worshippers. But that implies in man much more than the mere subjection of the material world. Man has become fairly successful in that. He has harnessed the powers of the universe, drawn the coal from the depths of the earth, and belted Niagara to his machinery.

But what sort of use is he making of all this? Are his motives narrow and exclusive, even destructive, or he is a fellow worker with God, utilizing the heritage of his Father for the well-being of his brothers and sisters everywhere? Is he serving God through his control of things in the only place where God needs to be served, in the weaker and poorer of his children? What awful waste there has been of the treasures of God's fields and hills during the War.

But now we turn with new zeal to the building of the Kingdom of Christ, the master plan of the ages for the dignity and value of every human soul. For if God is man's Father, all men are brothers. What a difference it makes if that distressed, tattered figure staggering through the street is your brother! You will take him to your bosom and your home, even as the forgiving father the dirty, starving prodigal. If brothers, the law of the family, which is service and cooperation, must somehow replace the law of strife and competition in the securing of riches for self. If brothers, the strong will help the weak and deliver them from the menace of the saloon and the gambling den and the house of shame. If all men and women are brothers and sisters a new purity and magnanimity will enter into social life.

The New Man in Christ

Finally we read in Ephesians the New Testament's great word regarding the new man in Christ, that man whom Christ has renewed in the divine likeness, recreated "in righteousness of holiness and truth." This is the glory of the Gospel: that it can take the sinful, fallen, unprepossessing human creature and renew in him the divine likeness, giving him a true perspective of life as God would have him see it, setting him free from hindering and cramping and defiling sins and vices, and showing him his Father! There is Jesus' challenge: "Be ye like your heavenly Father." The greatest privilege of sonship after all is to be like your father. Jesus says, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," and "to them gave he power to become the sons of God."

I remember very well a man in college whose brother had attended there years before and left a splendid record. As this young fellow progressed and revealed the quality of his spirit, one professor after another remarked, "How like he is to his elder brother!" All men honor the resemblance of Jesus Christ, saying, "Surely this man was the Son of God." But what a beautiful and moving thing it is when they say of some contemporary human spirit, "He reminds me of Jesus Christ." We call him our Elder Brother sometimes. I wonder if we remind people of him? The mission of the Holy Spirit is to raise up the sons of God into the likeness of Jesus Christ, "that he might be the first-born among many brethren."

The true dignity and worth of man is manifested supremely in Jesus. In him only is a man able fully to understand and appreciate the Father. Only men who have the Spirit of Christ are material for the Kingdom of the Ideal. Yet he is able to save to the uttermost, and he cautions us that we despise not the least of his brethren. When first I read this topic for our study there flashed upon my mind that text which combines the Old Testament and the New, and reaches out to the unseen glory of the children of God:

"Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."

By the Yale Protected Closet

The stealthy, sneaking porch climber never enters through the safely locked front or back doors.

IN through a window he goes and quietly takes his pick of jewelry, money, furs and valuables scattered around the house. Even while you may be happily at dinner, totally unconscious of danger.

Make one place within your home safe from the burglar who may get in through a window. Select one closet. In it place those articles of value you used to leave unguarded in many parts of the house.

Put a Yale Cylinder Night Latch on that closet door and you have a real safe deposit vault—a deadline against the porch climber, slinking intruder and the pilfering servant. They cannot pick, force or tamper with a Yale Cylinder Night Latch—and they know it.

See your hardware dealer today. Ask him for a Yale Cylinder Night Latch. Make sure that the trade-mark "Yale" is on it, install it on the closet door selected—and you have reduced the danger of loss to a minimum.

Yale Cylinder Night Latches are made by the makers of Yale Door Closers, Yale Padlocks, Yale Builders' Hardware, Yale Cabinet Locks, Yale Chain Blocks and Yale Bank Locks.

Questions and Answers

READER, Osnabrock, N. D. We are told distinctly in the Scriptures that the prayers of the righteous avail much—that they have power with God—and ly there can be no more acceptable prayers those of one who, himself a Christian, s for the salvation of some one who is yet nverted. You ask: "Can a soul be saved out going to church?" and we answer, s." But the Lord's house is the appointed e for prayer and worship, and it is the e where both praise and supplication as- with the greatest earnestness from many ts. Why "forsake the assembling," when have the opportunity to mingle with good le who would help you in every way ible? To your other question we would y that in joining the church you ought to orm to its ordinances and its prescribed es. There are thousands who wait and until their day of opportunity passes, the earnest desire and beautiful hope do return. Why wait, when you can come boldly for Christ, and ally yourself with e who are on the Lord's side? As to being med to confess Christ before men, you never be afraid that any shame will ever ble you on that account, after you have n the step. You will rather be surprised you were so foolish as to delay, and that did not do it earlier. There is nothing brings joy to the heart and gives a new ning to life, like this act, of which Jesus self said to his disciples: "Whosoever efore shall confess me before men, him will nfess also before my Father which is in ven."

esse E. Palmer, Franklin, Neb., would be eful to have from any reader a copy of the m entitled "My Master's Lily Garden."

W., Los Angeles, Calif. What is the seventh motive? Does it exist? If so, is it a quality of soul, or heart, or mind? The six known motives have been classified as follows: Self-preservation, love, duty, pride, gain and self-indulgence. I am searching for the seventh motive.

f you will analyze the six known motives, will find that each of them is based on our nan relations. They are all human mo- s, although love and duty are tinctured h divinity. May it not be that the seventh tive is the motive of self-sacrifice, which es only when our humanity is touched quickened with divinity and turned to ve God's purposes? Self-sacrifice has love its supreme law and leads to duty. But in ce of pride it feels humility; in place of n it seeks to give; in place of self-indul- nce it seeks to serve; in place of self-preser- ion it faces death fearlessly if danger eatens the path of faith and duty. The t evidence that self-sacrifice is the highest tive was given by the Master himself when said: "Greater love hath no man than this, t he lay down his life for his friends."

J. H. S., Washington, D. C. It is well known that many, if not indeed a large majority, of the Hebrew race in the United States have no idea of returning to Palestine. Yet we do not believe they are indifferent to the success of the nationalistic movement. On the contrary, they may be disposed to help it in every way with their means and influence. But with the Jews in Russia, and a number of other countries, the case is quite different. They look back across centuries of persecution, and look forward in uncertainty to what lies ahead. To this class, a protected Jewish commonwealth, with freedom of religion and the establishment of conditions favorable to Jewish progress, would be a welcome development.

Mrs. C. P. B., Shale, Calif. Your question is one which has been asked by many, but cannot be satisfactorily answered. The conditions you refer to have caused much regret, but we do not see how they can be overcome at the present time.

Harry S., Canfield, Ohio. Write to Dr. James M. Gray, Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, who may be able to enlighten you.

W. H. Winton, Rochester, N. Y., sends these interesting genealogical facts concerning General Pershing, which may be new to many readers: "Sincere wishes came true when General Pershing fulfilled the desire of an ancestor in helping the Allies save Alsace-Lorraine, when he led the victorious American army against the Germans. This came to light in a letter written in Alsace-Lorraine many years ago by Frederick Pershing, General Pershing's great-great-grandfather. In this letter the General's ancestor expressed the hope that his son, Frederick Pershing, Jr., or his descendants, would come back some day and redeem the fair lands of Alsace-Lorraine from oppression. The letter said the Pershings lived in the village of Kehe in Alsace-Lorraine in 1744 and fought under Emperor Charles against the Magyars. Soon afterward, a law was passed that all able-bodied men between the ages of sixteen and fifty must join the landwehr to protect their country from ravages by the Austrians. Frederick Pershing, Sr., sent his son to America. Frederick Pershing, Jr., reached this country in 1749, and marrying a Miss Wyant in Baltimore, settled in Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania, where General Pershing's grandparents were born."

Mrs. H. A. K., Buffalo Lake, Minn. Please explain I Cor. 7 : 34.

This is one of those passages concerning which Paul explains that he "has no commandment," but speaks or writes from his individual judgment. (See verse 12, same chapter.) He had already explained his attitude toward marriage and his preference for single life, showing how the celibate had a better opportunity to devote himself unreservedly to spiritual work than the married. He now applies the same argument to the other sex, claiming that marriage ties, when they dominate the life instead of being subordinated, are an obstacle to spiritual efficiency, and that the woman's sacrifice in this respect is the greater of the two. Paul in this instance, however, seems to be willing that his hearers should weigh such matters conscientiously and form their own judgment, his advice being intended as helpful, but not as absolute.

Czecho-Slovaks are the Czechs, or Bohemians, and other related peoples who formerly were subjects of Austria-Hungary. 3. "Bolsheviki" is pronounced "Bol-she-vee-kee." The word "Czech" is pronounced "Check."

Many readers will be glad to know that the story circulated in the daily press that the Salvation Army had decided to abandon the distinctive pokebonnet and tambourine is officially denied by the Salvation Army leaders. The Christian Herald referred to the decision as one to be regretted, and now we are pleased to be informed that no such change is in contemplation. Editor Walter F. Jenkins writes us: "There is not the slightest likelihood of our giving up our uniform, and the tambourine is always likely to be utilized by us in our meeting work."

Hilda Z., Gary, Ind. The passage in Isa. 3 : 12 is interpreted by commentators as meaning that those who ought to be protectors are exactors, and are as unqualified for rulership as children, and effeminate also. There is here a possible reference to the influence of the harem system, which dominated the court in some lands and resulted in the oppression of the people.

N. Y. G., LaSalle, Ill. 1. If a convert applies for church membership and proves to be ignorant of doctrinal requirements, provision is made for his instruction. This is done in practically all the denominations. 2. The causes for which a member may be dropped are, of course, scriptural. If he openly repudiates the doctrines taught, or falls into open sin and continues in it, he will be reasoned with, and only as a last resort, resulting from persistent offending, will the church be justified in dropping him from its rolls. 3. While the questions put to applicants for admission to church membership (excepting those who come with letters of recommendation from sister churches) vary in the different religious bodies, they are all related to the essentials of the Christian religion, and are not such as cannot be answered by any one who believes in Jesus Christ as the divine Saviour, who acknowledges him as a personal Saviour, and who is willing to observe the ordinances of the Church in its ministry and to lead a truly Christian life.

Mrs. S., Chillicothe. Before the war, 127 villages of the Lebanon district in Palestine had a population of 102,000. Over one-third of these persons are now dead, as the result of war and its hardships; thousands are orphans needing help; yet there is not a single orphanage in the entire district.

Miss E. D., Avery, Mo. There is a baptism with the Holy Ghost, as distinguished from the baptism with water. This baptism is through Christ, and was prophesied by John (Matt. 3 : 11) that "He that cometh after me shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." This form of baptism is promised to the saints and they all partake of it (I Cor. 12 : 13). Christ said of it, "Except a man be born of the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God" (John 3 : 5). To the attainment of this baptism the Word of God is essential. "That he might sanctify and cleanse it with the working of water by the Word."

America's food pledge 20 million tons

There Should Be a Good Refrigerator in Every Hom

Food is the greatest thing in the world -the most necessary to human existence.

Every individual is entitled to food to sustain life.

But, there is never enough to go around and it is estimated that from two to five million people starve every year.

Therefore, it is a sin to waste it or throw it away.

One quarter of an ounce of butter wasted in each American home every day amounts to 114,000,000 pounds a year. One ounce of meat wasted means 456,000,000 pounds of meat in a year.

Our Annual Food Waste is $65,000,000.00

L. S. Osborne, head of the Waste Disposal Conservation Section of the Food Administration, says: "Twenty-nine cities with a total population of 17,000,000 are discarding annually 1,200,000 tons of garbage which is producing 70,000,000 pounds of grease valued at $8,500,000 and 150,000 tons of fertilizer valued at $2,250,000."

One-sixth of the population, therefore, annually discards in garbage $10,760,000, making a total national waste of approximately $65,000,000.00.

A great share of this loss is caused by lack of Refrigeration in the home.

It is the Duty of Every Family to Prevent Food Waste

A Refrigerator is an economical, humanitarian and patriotic investment.

In addition to this it is a great comfort.

It lessens the work of the housewife.

It increases the efficiency and earning power of the m

It promotes the health of the whole family, and health wealth.

It provides properly chilled drinks in hot weather a keeps the milk sweet and cool for the children.

It enables a hungry man to find a lunch when he wants because he knows where to look for it.

It is a sanitary food storage plant—simple in constructi and economical in operation.

It is said that an army travels on its stomach—so does t working man or woman, the business man and professio man—ALL get their energy from food.

That is where YOU get YOURS.

A Refrigerator Saves Food, Increases Efficiency and Earning Power

Increase your vitality and health and you increase yo earning power, improve your environment, add to your pre tige and know the full joy of living.

Note What 91 Doctors Say

Here are some facts with regard to the feeding of children that all mothers ought to know:

We lately asked 118 physicians to name the fruits they most often recommended for children.

91 named oranges as one of the best fruits for children from three to fifteen years of age. 50 of this number mentioned only oranges.

107 named oranges for children under 3 years of age, 93 of these physicians referring only to this fruit.

Dr. L. Emmett Holt's Opinion

Dr. L. Emmett Holt, the famous child specialist, in his book, The Care and Feeding of Children, says:

"Some fruit should be given to most healthy children every day. . . . Oranges, baked apples and stewed prunes are most to be depended upon. . . . The best fruit juice is that of the orange, which should be fresh and sweet."

Such comments as these are important to remember when you purchase your family's daily food.

Oranges Plentiful Now

Now oranges are again plentiful—California having this year produced a crop of almost normal size.

That means twice as many oranges as were shipped from California last year when a period of severe heat destroyed two-thirds of the crop.

It is estimated that this year's California crop will total 14,000,000 boxes, so there will be enough for everyone everywhere—and at reasonable prices.

So keep a bowl full of oranges in your dining room—it adds to the room's cheeriness, and keeps this healthful fruit within easy reach.

That's as it should be, because a fruit so good should be constantly suggested.

Uniformly Good Oranges

Sunkist are California's uniformly good oranges. They are easiest to peel, easiest to segment, and easiest to slice, because they are meaty, firm and practically seedless. They are luscious, juicy, sweet and easy to prepare in delicious desserts and zestful salads.

Oranges are just as good for grown-ups as for children, so use them often in these ways.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

Margaret Sangster's Letters

MISS SANGSTER has made a remarkable trip through France, Germany and Belgium for the Christian Herald, and a wonderful series of articles will be published, running steadily from week to week. Here is some indication of her topics:

BELGIAN FACTORY SITUATION. The greatest of all the losses that lgium is facing is the loss of her factories, and Charleroi, Belgium's industry nter, tells the story. Charleroi was occupied by the Germans from August 22, 14, until November 15, 1918.

WHY WE CANNOT UNDERSTAND FRANCE. The reason why the casual itor cannot understand the temperament and the motives of France.

WHAT THEY THINK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS. Being the views forth by people, political and otherwise, in France, Belgium and Germany.

JOSEPH REINACH. An interview in which the great statesman speaks of ter-the-war conditions, and how they will affect the life, the art and the mor- s of the world. He also speaks of prohibition, peace treaties and America.

THE ARMY EDUCATIONAL BUREAU. Telling how our army plans to ucate the soldier who has fought for his country.

AFTER-THE-WAR PLANS OF THE RED CROSS. An interview with a ed Cross executive in which he outlines the work to be done.

THE DOUGHBOY'S POINT OF VIEW. In which real doughboys for per- ps the first time really say in print what they think of the army and the war.

THE GREAT MOMENT. How the great moments are the most undramatic nes. The unostentatious opening of the Peace Conference.

Other Features Coming

"A SACRIFICE HIT"

A ROBUST baseball story, with gripping appeal to the sport spirit, is by the genius of George Gilbert given a powerful religious significance, suggesting one solution of the problem of Sunday sports. This will appear when baseball interest is keenest. Two fine illustrations by George Avison.

"IS YOUR DAUGHTER SAFE?"

THE temptations and dangers by which girls are surrounded are astounding, as summed up by Albert Sidney Gregg, Superintendent of the American Civic Reform Union, who describes in detail the vitally important new movement for Welfare Circles, in which girls are taught to safeguard themselves. Every parent ought to know about this movement.

IN MIDST OF BOLSHEVISM

AN INTIMATE account of the social, political and industrial conditions actually existing in Russia, as encountered there by General Socrate Khan, n American citizen, formerly of the royal Persian staff. How maids demand use of their mistress's parlors, private soldiers claim equality with officers, workmen refuse to take orders from employers. Many other strange conceptions of iberty.

Miss Margaret E. Sangster

THE LITTLE SINS OF GOOD PEOPLE

"IT IS not alone what we call great coarse crimes and misdemeanors," writes Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, "which give to a city or community a low moral tone of life." In a sermon of extraordinary power, to appear soon, this famous Topeka pastor and author flays the little foxes in the vineyard of Christian character.

A GOOD WORD FOR MEXICO

SAMUEL G. INMAN, Secretary of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, has been in Mexico a long time, officially studying conditions. He is convinced that the republic under Carranza is finding itself. He gives a comprehensive size-up of the situation, political, industrial, educational and religious, and a heart-to-heart talk with Carranza on his hopes and purposes.

Adriatic Dispute Halts Peace

Italy Threatens to Seize Fiume and Dalmatia and Give the League of Nations Its First Test

THE sky of the Peace Confer- ce was cloudy t clearing on ril 21. Al- ough Vienna d gone Bolshevik and President Ebert had declared lshevism for Germany preferable to a too hard ace, the breakdown of Russian Bolshevist armies three fronts, and the successful resistance to the Reds German cities, cast a ray of light across the impend- g cloud of terrorism, the rapid rise of which had hur- d the peace-making. Italy's demand for Fiume also used to yield to persuasion or compromise.

The inner council of the Peace Conference gave over e week ending April 25 to the discussion of Italy's im to Fiume and the Dalmatian Islands, promised her in the secret Treaty of London. Italy was re- rted as willing to grant concessions regarding the ands, and even as willing to grant the Jugo-Slav ate the free use of the port of Fiume. But the Italian emier Orlando and the Foreign Minister Sonnino re adamant in their resistance to any suggestion at Italy give up Fiume. Premiers Lloyd George d Clemenceau were reported as willing to com- omise, while President Wilson, declaring that Amer- a did not fight for the Treaty of London, was re- rted to favor giving Fiume to Jugo-Slavia as neces- ry to the life of that nation. The Italians held ume and the territory between it and Trieste with crack decision of Arditi, the Italian army, was said be united against any compromise on Fiume, and ere were rumors, current more or less for a fortnight it gaining in definiteness, that Italy, if the Confer- ce should decide against her, might withdraw from e Conference, garrison strongly the disputed terri- ry and await events.

Paris dispatches of April 15 reported that German presentatives had been asked to be at Versailles on pril 25 to receive the terms of peace. It was expected at the German delegation would number about venty-five persons and would reach Versailles on pril 24, the program providing that they should be dged in the residence of Mme. de Pompadour and at the treaty of peace would be signed in the famous all of Mirrors and the meetings held in the Trianon alace. It was reported that President Wilson would main in Paris for the signing of the treaty, which bservers in Paris expected somewhere between June and 10.

loyd George on the Problems of Peace

PREMIER LLOYD GEORGE returned to London from the Peace Conference on April 14 and addressed the House of Commons on pril 16, to answer personally criticism of the Brit- h delegates in Paris and to set at rest uneasiness Britain caused by rumors that Germany was to be t off easy. The speech was the clearest explanation f the extent of the matters before the Peace Con- erence and the difficulties faced by the representa- ives of the nations in Paris that has come across the ater up to the present time.

Premier Lloyd George declared that he was fully ware that there was a good deal of impatience in the orld for peace, but he said no conference assembled n the history of the world had been confronted with roblems of such variety, of such perplexity, of such nagnitude and of such gravity.

"The Congress of Vienna was the nearest approach o it," he said. "It had to settle the affairs of Europe. t took eleven months. But the problems at Vienna ere insignificant compared with those to be settled t the Paris Conference.

"It is not one continent that is engaged. Every ontinent is affected. Ten new states have sprung nto existence. . . . and the boundaries of fourteen ountries have to be recast," he said.

"But," he continued, "there are problems equally reat, equally important, not of a territorial character, ut all affecting the destiny of the human race, where you make a blunder humanity may have to pay." These problems, he said, affect armament, economic questions, trade questions, international waterways and railways, questions of indemnity, international arrangements for labor. "And," he said, "there is that great experiment—an experiment upon which the hope of the world for peace will hang—the Society of Nations." The delegates were justified in taking some time to set up the machinery of the Society of Nations, because in so doing they created machinery capable of readjusting and correcting possible mistakes, and thereby really saved time.

A Hard-Working Conference

THE premier in two sentences showed the pressure under which the Conference was working and the necessity for speed. He said: "We have to shorten our labors, work crowded hours, long and late, because while we were trying to build we saw in many lands the foundations of society crumbling into dust. We had to make haste. I venture to say that no body of men have worked harder and that no body of men ever worked with better heart.

The premier pleaded with his audience to leave in peace, for calm deliberation, the men who were doing their best to solve difficulties trying both to temper and to judgment.

"You are dealing with a multitude of nations," he went on, "most of them with a problem of its own, each and every one of them with a different point of view, even where the problems are common, looking from different angles at questions, and sometimes, perhaps, with different interests. And it requires all the tact and all the patience and all the skill that we can command to prevent the different interests from conflicting."

Many questions had arisen in the Conference, he declared, "that almost imperiled the peace of Europe while we were sitting there. Those questions are of importance to small states, but it was the quarrels of the small states that made the great war. Central Europe is falling into small states. The greatest care must be taken lest causes of future unrest be created by the settlement which we make."

He said regarding Russia that he had heard simple remedies advocated, some saying "Use force," and some saying "Make peace," but it was not as easy as all that, Russia being one of the most complex problems ever dealt with by any body of men. One difficulty was that "there is no Russia, no body of men that can say it is the government for the whole of Russia." Russia is a vast country in a state of complete confusion and anarchy. "It is just like a volcano which is still in furious eruption, and the best you can do is to provide security for those who are dwelling on the lava that it may not scorch other lands." The question as to what kind of government they should have was purely a Russian question for the Russians to settle among themselves. Russia is easy to invade and very difficult to conquer; very easy to get into, and very difficult to get out of. He declared that military intervention would not solve Russia's troubles, but would probably bankrupt Britain and would be "the greatest act of folly ever committed by any government."

Our Anti-Bolshevist Allies

REGARDING the support which the Allies had given to the enemies of the Bolsheviki, he said this was justified by military considerations, support thus given preventing Germany from getting all of Russia under her power and keeping out of German hands the immense grain and mineral resources of the Urals and Siberia. The Allies could not now abandon these anti-Bolshevist governments in Russia, but were bound to support them with the materials of war as long as they were able to retain the support of the populations behind them. If Russia is to be redeemed, she must be redeemed by own her sons; and all they ask is that they shall be supplied with the necessary arms to fight for their own protection and freedom.

Regarding measures to prevent the eruption of Bolshevism into Allied lands the premier, speaking for the Allies, said: "We are organizing all the forces of the Allied countries bordering on the Bolshevist territory, from the Baltic to the Black Sea—Poland, Czechoslovakia and Rumania. There is no doubt that those populations are anti-Bolshevik. The Bolshevists may menace them or not. Whether they do or not, we shall be ready for any attempt to overrun Europe by force."

"The world will not be pacified as long as Russia is torn and rent by civil war," the premier declared. He had no apology to make for an effort which had been attempted to bring the various factions in Russia together. The premier continued. "I do not despair of a solution in time. There are factors in the situation even now which are promising. Reliable information which we have received indicates that whilst the Bolsheviki are apparently growing in strength Bolshevism itself is rapidly on the wane. It is breaking down before the relentless pressure of economic facts. . . . This process must inevitably continue.

"There are unmistakable signs," he believed, "that Russia is emerging from the fever, and when the time comes, when she is once more sane, calm and normal, we will make peace in Russia. It is idle now to say that the world is at peace."

He asked the members of the House not to contemplate the possibility of another great war, saying: "We have had quite enough of fighting," a statement which brought cheers from his audience.

Speaking of the general terms of peace, he hoped that within another week they would be presented to the German delegates.

It was thoroughly untrue, he said, that America and Britain had been at variance in the Conference. No one could have treated with more sympathy than President Wilson did the peculiar problems and special susceptibilities of Europe. All the conclusions of the Peace Conference had been unanimous. Its proceedings had not been made public, because to make conclusions public before they were discussed with the enemy would be a first-class blunder which might defeat the whole purpose of the Conference. Britain had stated her peace terms before the war was over, and these had been practically embodied in President Wilson's famous fourteen points, and the Peace Treaty would follow very closely the line of these two statements.

Back to Work

HE SAID he had talked to many soldiers awaiting demobilization, both British and French, and that all of them had expressed one desire, for a quick, good peace. He said that the people of France were not out for revenge, but for justice, and that the world wants to get back quickly to work, and it wants to get to work under better conditions than it had before the war. He said that he was proud that Britain had been first to take up this desire of labor for better conditions and to take action. . . . "It is essential," he said, "that the ordinary machinery of commerce and industry be set going. You cannot do that without peace. Peace is necessary, otherwise our efforts will be squandered." He said that one of the beneficent results of peace would be that the great continental menace of armaments would be swept away, and that all European countries should profit by this, and not Germany alone. It was impossible, he was sure, for Germany to restore her military power, since it was difficult for her at present to get together 80,000 men, and "her guns and her weapons of defense on sea and land and in the air have been taken away," and the real danger was hunger.

Closing he declared: "Europe itself has suffered more in the last five years than ever in its whole blood-stained history. It has been demonstrated to vaster multitudes of human beings than ever what war means. For that reason the opportunity for organizing the world on a basis of peace is such a one as has never been presented to the world before.

"And in this fateful hour it is the supreme duty of statesmen in every land of parliaments on whose will the statesmen depend, and of those who guide and direct public opinion to consecrate the sacrifice of millions to the permanent redemption of the human race from the scourge and agony of war."

The Setback to Bolshevism

BY FAR the greatest news of the week, ending April 21, was the apparent crumbling of Bolshevism, which, though gaining followers in parts of Austria and Germany, was losing ground in Russia, while the anti-Bolshevist government of Admiral Kolchak at Omsk was gaining in strength and in the confidence of the Allies.

It was unofficially reported in London on April 18 that soon after the signing of peace the Allies would recognize the Kolchak Government as the de facto government in Russia and would provide this government liberally with munitions of war and economic assistance, enabling it to speedily vanquish the Bolsheviki. It was expected that this recognition would greatly weaken the Bolshevists who were already losing their hold upon the peasantry. The Omsk Government was showing great military and financial stability.

The Russian Bolshevist troops on April 18, 19 and 20 were defeated in three important theatres of war. In the Murmansk-Archangel region, attacks by new loyal Russian forces, assisted by British, French and American troops, broke the front of the Reds and forced them back over 14 miles, the Allies capturing prisoners, guns and material.

Southwest of Ufa in the Urals the forces of the Siberian Government at Omsk drove the Bolshevists, three divisions of whose troops were reported in mutiny, a distance of 67 miles. The Moscow Bolshevik Government admitted this retirement. On the Ukrainian front on April 20 the Bolshevist First Army was said to have surrendered. The reported surrender occurred 150 miles northeast of Kiev, on the Pripet River, and involved 35 cannon, 200 machine guns and 20,000 rifles, the number of men not being given. The Bolsheviki were still winning in the Crimea, where they greatly outnumbered the Allies. A truce for 8 days was arranged on April 18 to permit the evacuation of Sebastopol by the Allies.

The plan proposed by Herbert Hoover for a neutral commission, under Dr. Nansen, through which the starving in Russia would be fed was approved by the Interallied Council on April 17. It was stipulated that fighting must cease and that measures should be taken to make certain the distribution of the food to those most needing it.

Following disorders in Vienna during the week of April 13, in which the Parliament Buildings were attacked and set on fire, the Soldiers' Council on April 18 established a communist régime in Austria's capital, the soldiers restoring order. The Allied food mission assisted the restoration of order by announcing that further disorders would result in the cutting off of the food supply.

Troops of the Ebert Government maintaining order in Berlin were reported to have killed and wounded a number of persons on April 14 in a collision with venders selling stolen goods, who forcibly opposed their removal from the center of the city. There were also collisions on April 14 between the Soviet troops and the government forces at Brunswick, Magdeburg and in Silesia. At Munich government troops gained control on April 13, but on April 16 the Bolshevist element were again in control in Munich. The Hoffman Government organized a force of loyal troops to retake the capital and requested the Ebert Government in Berlin to send troops to assist the loyal Bavarian troops in the recapture of Munich. The Communists had surrounded the city with trenches and had placed machine guns and artillery in position to command all approaches.

The Week in the World's News

PRESIDENT LAUNCHES VICTORY LOAN. In a special cable on April 19, President Wilson sent from Paris a message to the American people calling upon them to redeem in full faith the promise of the sacrifice of blood shed by 60,000 of America's sons in the battle for world liberty. He said: "Today the world stands freed from the threat of Militarism, which has so long weighed upon the spirit and the labor of peaceful nations. But as yet we stand only at the threshold of happier times. To enter, we must fulfil to the utmost the engagements we have made. The Victory Liberty Loan is the indispensable means." With the slogans "Sure, we'll finish the job," and "Over the Top the first day," the cities, towns and countryside started out on April 21 to make the campaign for the Victory Loan an immediate victory in itself. Many communities entered the campaign with their quotas subscribed or exceeded, and there was abundant evidence that the nation was ready in heart and pocketbook for this last public offering of the nation's notes.

INDIA HALTS REVOLUTION. Early in April there were a number of reports of revolution and disorders at Delhi and Bombay and other points in Northwest India. London reports of April 16 indicated that order had been restored. The government buildings were burned at Ahmenadabad and a troop train was derailed outside of Bombay. Later reports showed 200 casualties in the fighting at Amritsar and reported a number of railway stations and public buildings injured, with disorderly elements still damaging property, and looting trains, in the Punjab.

OUR MINISTER TO POLAND. The United States gave formal recognition to the Paderewski Government in Poland, on April 15, when Hugh Gibson of the American Embassy in Paris became the first American Minister to Poland.

UNEMPLOYMENT DECREASES. The United States Employment Service on April 18 reported a slight decrease in the nation's labor surplus, and an unfilled demand for farm labor.

CHICAGO TO NEW YORK BY AIR. Captain E. F. White, an American Army aviator, on April 19, flew from Chicago to New York, 727 miles, in 6 hours and 50 minutes.

HELLO GIRLS WIN STRIKE. A strike of telephone central operators in the 5 New England States practically put a stop to all telephone communication in New England from April 15 to 21. The strike was a physical demonstration to New England of the necessity which the telephone has become in our life. The strike was undertaken to force a wag vance and to secure opportunity to speak dir with the officials of the companies. Assistant master General Koons reached Boston with full ers to arrange a settlement. The strike was settl April 20, the operators securing increases in w

Japan and the Far East

CONSIDERABLE interest has been aroused the fact that Japan is not among the powers th have agreed to support the Kolchak government Siberia recognized by the Allies. Japan has been d tributing her favors among several independent lea ers who have armed forces in the field between Vla vostok and Baikal. Her activity in this direction b came so great during the winter that at the instan of the State Department at Washington one of h agents was recalled to Tokio after he had contribut what was generally said to be $200,000, to the suppo of a faction not countenanced by the Allied Power

The failure of the Japanese peace delegation Paris to obtain sanction for their racial equality claus the attitude of the Allied Powers toward Japane policies in Siberia, and the lack of sympathy show by the western world to Japan in her effort to pu down the remarkable revolution in Korea, have com bined to induce a demand by several influential new papers in Tokio that the Island Empire accept position of isolation and redevelop her old spirit nationalism, ignoring entirely the occident.

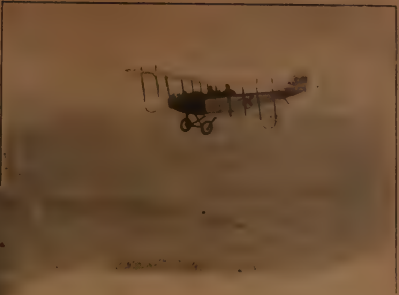
In Korea the revolt shows no sign of collapse. O April 16, 50,000 more troops were ordered to th peninsula. The Rev. Eli M. Mowry, Presbyteria missionary from Mansfield, O., was placed on trial i Seoul on the 17th, charged with permitting the use his property for the dissemination of Korean revolu tionary propaganda. He admitted sheltering fi Koreans, but denied any intention to further the plans. The other missionaries were released.

The Koreans have found one strong advocate i Japan in the person of Viscount Kato. The forme foreign minister in a speech in Tokio strongly urge the granting of immediate autonomy to Korea, an attacked the policy of holding colonies for profit.

In the elimination of German financial interest from China, the Chinese cabinet has decided to divid between the American, British and French interest the German share of the so-called Four-Power railway loan agreement concluded in 1911 by which representatives of these powers were to build sections of the Hankow-Szechuan line.

TO SPAN THE ATLANTIC BY AIRPLANE

By F. A. COLLINS



ODDLY coincident with the one hundredth anniversary of the first voyage by steamship across the Atlantic Ocean, it now appears from their feverish haste in preparation that the United States, France or Great Britain will emorate that epoch-making voyage by making rst transoceanic airplane flight.

is flight, certain of achievement this spring or er, will establish the new era of transoceanic l, making the trip between Europe and America tter of twenty-four hours instead of five days— w—aboard the fastest steam vessels.

s a little more than four hundred years ago that topher Columbus established contact between ica and the old continent, crossing the ocean in ree diminutive caravels. This epochal voyage red thirty-seven days before the Italian discov- ighted land on October 12, 1492.

ree centuries later, on May 22, 1819, the little en steamship Savannah, of 350 tons, set out r her own steam from the port of the same name orgia, and a month later put into the Mersey in and. The event was heralded as the most signifi- of the age.

both sides of the Atlantic preparations are near- ompletion for making the long-promised air from continent to continent. Five countries ompeting for the honor of being the first to make reat air voyage.

umber of rich prizes totaling $125,000 await the nate air pilot who negotiates the trip.

en more desired, however, is the fame to be won he new Columbus of the air. It is confidently icted by experts both in the United States and pe that within a year the ocean crossing by the oute will be a commonplace.

is difficult to realize the importance of thus re- g the voyage between Europe and America for mails or passenger traffic.

e safest way of making the great air voyage would tless be by dirigible balloon. There are several ese giant aircraft, both in England and Germany, h could probably make a non-stop air trip from inent to continent and assure considerable com- for the passengers. The dirigible has of course ely one-half the speed of the airplane.

MERICAN aviators base their hopes of winning the coveted air prize on the flying craft of either army or navy. The government is rushing plans ttempt the flight both with army and navy ma- es at an early date. The army intends to make the t with a powerful biplane. The navy will use one s giant seaplanes of the NC–1 type. One of these lanes has carried fifty-one passengers and trav- at the rate of eighty-five miles an hour. The t wings measure 126 feet from tip to tip, while the y has a length of sixty-eight feet, and is raised nty-four feet above the water. The seaplane can s land on the surface of the sea and ride compara- ly high waves.

he great seaplane will be driven by either of two ts, who sit side by side in an enclosed cabin. A v of five men is required to handle the aircraft. pite its great size the naval machine is easily con- led. It is capable of climbing 2,000 feet in ten utes. For the over-sea flight the naval seaplane carry four Liberty motors capable of developing ard of 1,500 horsepower. One of these machines has flown over 400 miles without alighting, at a speed of nearly 100 miles an hour. The navy machine will fly from Newfoundland to the coast of Ireland.

Preparations made by Captain Sunstedt for the trans-Atlantic flight are also practically complete. The aviator, who is a Swedish subject, planned to make the flight in the spring of 1917, but was prevented by the war. On the signing of the armistice Captain Sunstedt at once commenced the construction of an especially designed airplane, which has been christened the "Sunrise." The machine has a wing spread of 100 feet and is driven by two six-cylinder Liberty motors with a combined horsepower of 440, which will insure a speed of eighty miles an hour. The Sunrise carries two tons of gasoline, which it is believed will carry the machine from New York to London without replenishing.

There are probably four airplanes in America today capable of making the trans-Atlantic flight, and perhaps several more whose secret is being closely guarded. The possible winners are the all-American designed and built navy seaplane NC-1, the Glenn-Martin bomber, the American modified Handley-Page and the giant Caproni triplane. It is rumored that several airplane manufacturers in America have been at work for a long time on special planes designed to make the over-sea flight, but that they will not be announced and exposed for inspection until just before the flight is attempted.

SOME weeks ago Graham White, the British aviator, advertised in an aeronautical publication for a pilot to attempt the trans-Atlantic air voyage. It is known on this side of the Atlantic that the British plans for making the over-sea flight, which are elaborate, are nearing completion. A giant Handley-Page machine is actually being packed for shipment to the United States to make the eastward flight. It is supplied with four Rolls-Royce motors, which combined develop 1,500 horsepower. The airplane may be counted on to travel ninety-five miles an hour. It uses up sixty-two gallons of gasoline per hour.

Elaborate preparations have been made for safeguarding the aircraft on the trans-Atlantic trip. The General Commercial Air Board has established a special meteorological department, and fifty standard observation stations have already been put in operation in the British Isles. Weather reports will be exchanged with the international stations of the world. Wireless stations are being established on the great aerial routes to transmit information from all air observatories. Box kites carrying delicate instruments to determine atmospheric conditions will be flown from trans-Atlantic liners between England and the United States, and the weather conditions communicated as quickly as possible to the air pilots.

England is making similar plans to connect the mother country with the colonies both by airplane and dirigible balloon fleets.

In Italy a giant Caproni triplane is being constructed capable of carrying 100 passengers. The machine will be ready for flight by June, when it is planned to fly across the Atlantic. The Italian pilots believe that by that time the air lanes across the ocean will be definitely established.

THERE are half a dozen or more possible air routes across the Atlantic. Several years ago, when the trans-Atlantic flight was first discussed, it was planned to arrange a series of stepping-stones to assist the aircraft. By placing mother ships at intervals of 300 miles along the route, it was believed that the aircraft would always be within reach of assistance and could thus replenish their fuel. The development of the aircraft has been so rapid since the war began and continuous flights are now so much longer that the idea of the stepping-stones has been abandoned. Some of the aircraft will attempt the direct air route, flying first to St. John's, N. F., and thence to the Irish coast. The distance between Newfoundland and Ireland is 1,834 miles.

Another route which shortens the distance is by way of Greenland. The distance from Newfoundland to Cape Farewell is 870 miles and from Cape Farewell to Ireland 1,470 miles. The longer side of the triangle is thus reduced by nearly 400 miles.

The shortest sea flight is found, however, on the Azores route. The Azores lie 900 miles off the coast of Lisbon and the distance from Newfoundland to the Azores is but 1,200 miles. It is believed that any of the machines now being tuned up for the great flight can readily cover these distances without once coming down.

The presence of hundreds of ships scattered far and wide over the Atlantic lends an element of safety to the enterprise.

The aircraft will of course carry powerful wireless telegraph apparatus with a working radius of hundreds of miles. The wireless apparatus for indicating the direction from which messages travel will also be used. In case an aircraft needs assistance it can readily communicate with ships for hundreds of miles in all directions and summon aid.

EDUCATION AND AMERICANIZATIO

By HON. FRANKLIN K. LANE

United States Secretary of the Interior

Secretary Lane

IT HAS never seemed to me that it was difficult to define Americanization or Americanism: "I appreciate something, I admire something, I love something. I want you, my friends, my neighbors, to appreciate and admire and love that thing, too. That something is America."

The process is not one of science; the process is one of humanity. But just as there is no way by which the breath of life can be put into a man's body, once it has gone out, so there is no manner by which, with all our wills, we can make an American out of a man who is not inspired by our ideals, and there is no way by which we can make anyone feel that it is a blessed and splendid thing to be an American, unless we are ourselves aglow with the sacred fire, unless we interpret Americanism by our kindness, our courage, our generosity, our fairness.

What is America? There is a physical America and there is a spiritual America. And they are so interwoven that you can not tell where the one ends and the other begins.

I would give to the man whom I wished to Americanize (after he had learned the language of this land) a knowledge of the physical America, so as to get an admiration, not only of its strength, of its resources, of what it could do against the world, but that he might have pride in this as a land of hope and a land in which men had won out.

And I would give to that man a knowledge of America that would make him ask the question, "How did this come to be?" And then he would discover that there was something more to our country than its material strength.

It has a history. It has a tradition. I would take that man to Plymouth Rock and I would ask, "What does that Rock say to you?" I would take him down on the James River to its ruined church and I would ask, "What does that little church say to you?" And I would take him to Valley Forge and point out the huts in which Washington's men lived, 3,000 of them, struggling for the independence of our country. And I would ask, "What do they mean to you? What caused them, what induced those colonists to suffer as they did—willingly?"

And then I would take him to the field of Gettysburg and lead him to the spot where Lincoln delivered his immortal address, and I would ask him, "What does that speech mean to you? Not how beautiful it is! But what word does it speak to your heart? How much of it do you believe?"

And then I would take him to Santiago de Cuba and I would ask, "What does that bay mean to you?"

And I would take him over to the Philippines where 10,000 native teachers every day teach 800,000 native children the English language. And I would bring him back from the Philippines to the Hawaiian Islands.

And I would show the man how these children, whether Japanese or American, no matter what their source, stood every morning before the American flag and raised their little hands and pledged themselves to one language, one country, and one God.

And then I would bring him back to this country and say, "Grasp the meaning of what I have shown you and you will know then what Americanism is. It is not 110,000,000 people alone, it is 110,000,000 people who have lived through struggle, and who have arrived through struggle, who have won through work. Let us never forget that!"

We are to conquer this land in that spirit and in our spirit we are to conquer other lands because our spirit is one that like a living flame goes abroad.

And again it is like some blessed wind—some soft, sweet wind that carries a benison across the Pacific and the Atlantic. And we must keep alive in ourselves the thought that this spirit is Americanism, that it is robust and dauntless and kindly and hearty and fertile and irresistible, and through it men win out against all adversity. That is what has made us great.

It is sympathetic. It is compelling. It is revealing. It is just. The one peculiar quality in our institutions is, that not alone in our hearts, but out of our hearts, has grown a means by which man can acquire justice for himself.

How best may we spread that spirit through the land—how best can we explain our purposes and interpret our systems?

Through the community council, through the school, I am making an appeal to Congress on behalf of an appropriation which will permit us to deliver from bondage thousands, tens of thousands, millions of children and men and women in these United States—to liberate them from the blinders of ignorance, that all the wealth and beauties of literature and the knowledge that come through the printed word can now be revealed to them.

Congress will be asked to help all States willing to cooperate in banishing illiteracy.

And I want you to help. We want to interpret America in terms of fair play; in terms of the square deal. We want, in the end, to interpret America in healthier babies that have enough milk to drink. We want to interpret America in boys and girls and men and women that can read and write. We want to interpret America in better housing conditions and decent wages, in hours that will allow a father to know his own family.

That is Americanization in the concrete.

This is the spirit of the Declaration of Independence put into terms that are social and economic.

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

More Schoolhouses

PREVIOUS to our entrance into the war we were spending in the United States a hundred million dollars a year on new schoolhouses, but at this rate we were in no wise supplying the need. Hundreds of thousands of children in the lower grades were on half-time attendance, and millions attended schools in houses wholly unsuited to school use, according to modern standards—badly ventilated, poorly lighted and otherwise unsanitary.

For the two years of our participation in the war, schoolhouse building almost ceased, and there are now both the need of 1916 and the accumulated need of the two years of the war, larger than in normal times because of the unprecedented shifting of population.

To supply these needs will require not less than five hundred million dollars of building, to be completed by the time of the opening of the schools in the fall of 1920. It is very important, therefore, that legislatures, county and city councils, and boards of education all over the United States immediately take the necessary steps for this building and for the raising of money necessary for it.

If there be danger of over-supply of labor during the period of demobilization and readjustment and a consequent lack of employment for the men returning from the army and from the munition plants, such a schoolhouse building program will be no inconsiderable factor in the solution of this problem of employment.

In view of the part which popular tion must play in the new era there little or no objection to any expend for building that may be necessary f full efficiency of our school systems.

How Education Pays

BOYS and girls who go to work a end of grammar school rarely get jobs. The work they find to do is us unskilled; it offers little training or ch for advancement. When they are they find that they are still untraine the skilled work which offers a future.

Many boys and girls when they l school find work that offers a high wag a beginner. But these wages seldom because the work requires no training

A position with a future and steadil creasing wages requires school training

A table prepared by the United St Bureau of Education compares the w of a group of children who left school a years of age with another group who at 18 years of age.

At 25 years of age the average boy had remained in school until 18 had ceived over $2,000 more salary than average boy who left at 14 and was t receiving over $900 a year more.

This is equivalent to an investmen $18,000 at 5 per cent. Can a boy incre his capital as fast any other way?

From this time on the salary of the b ter educated boy will rise still more rapi while the earnings of the boy who school at 14 will increase but little.

Although the wages paid now are m higher than when this study was ma the comparison remains the same.

Illiterate Children

AN ALARMING percentage of illitera among certain groups of working c dren is disclosed in figures made public the Children's Bureau, U. S. Departme of Labor. These figures are based on t experience of the bureau in issuing Fede certificates of age to children going to w in five States where State certificates w not acceptable for the purposes of the former Fede Child Labor Law.

More than one-fourth, or 5,294, of the 19,546 ch dren between 14 and 16 years of age to whom c tificates were issued by the Children's Bureau co not sign their own names legibly.

The majority of the States provide that childr shall stay in school until they are fourteen years age, and the American theory is that a normal ch will have completed the eighth grade by that ti In the five States where Federal certificates were sued by the Children's Bureau, 18,379 white childre between 14 and 16 years old were certificated. On 742 of them had reached the eighth grade in schoo Of 1,166 colored children to whom certificates we issued only 40 reached the eighth grade. In oth words, 96 per cent. of the white children and 97 pe cent. of the colored children granted certificates ha not reached the eighth grade in school. In som States a child can not secure a work permit until he i 16 years old unless he has completed the eighth grade Only 248 or 1.3 per cent. of the total number of chil dren certificated could have met such a requiremen because they alone of the children certificated ha attained the ninth grade or higher.

Millions of Illiterates

ACCORDING to the last census report there were more than eight and a half million persons over ten years of age in the United States who were either totally illiterate or could not read or write the English language. That was in 1910. In 1918, due to the disclosures of illiteracy in the military examinations, we are led to believe that many must have passed as "literate" in this census who could barely sign their names.

The South leads in native-born illiteracy, but a staggeringly large percentage of people in all our industrial centres can communicate with America only through interpreters. Sixteen per cent. of the population of Passaic, N. J., for instance, cannot speak English, and 13 per cent. in Lawrence and Fall River, Mass.

Of the foreign-born wage-earners in this country five years or more, only 31 per cent. are naturalized and only 14 per cent. have first papers. Only 8 per cent. of the Russians residing here between five and nine years have been naturalized, only 5 per cent. of the Portuguese, and only 4 per cent. of the Greeks. No nation in the history of the world ever held so many aliens or permitted any such an unallegianced multitude to share equality with its own people.

BRUSSELS By Margaret E. Sangster

THE streets of Brussels are cleaner than the Paris streets. And the buildings—gleaming white stone buildings, most of them—would unbelievably immaculate if they were ›wn beside the tarnished gray-brown Paris buildings. Little parks dot ity and splendid bits of sculpture at unexpected places. Oh, it's a iful city, Brussels. And yet—— rrived in Brussels at four o'clock in morning. When our train pulled y into the great station it was still hours before dawn. But Brussels 't a sleeping city—not at all. Brigh glittered from hotels and cafés, r cars clattered over the pavestones, pedestrians jogged elbows with other trians. Brussels was wide awake; sels was throbbingly alive—pulsing a feverish gaiety.

ired a taxi from a bandit who had d taxi-driver, and started for the that I had been directed to as the best in Brussels. I had been directed to a good many people—my five train panions, a correct little lady in France, the concièrge of my own rooms in . So it was without any doubt that e the address, and sank wearily back g the cushions and gave myself up e anticipation of a soft bed and a large bath.

wasn't long before we arrived at the l—a great impressive place with bright lights over the swinging glass doors. ady porter took my suitcase from my hand and led me through the door into a dazzlingly brilliant hall.

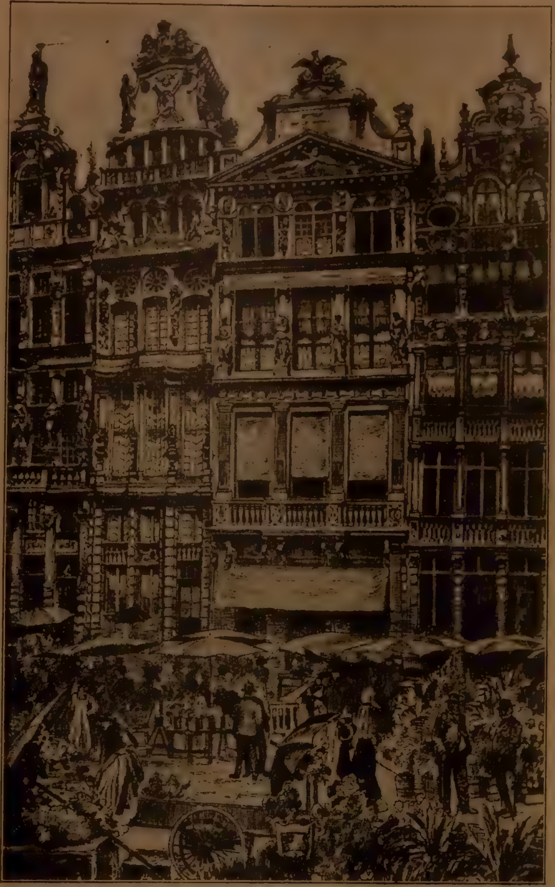
ROM one side of me came the sound of dance music, played loudly, aggressive- A girl in a surprising frock staggered out e dining-salon on the arm of a man in rgeous uniform. They were singing strange, strident voices.

went surprisedly down the hall of the hotel in Brussels. Three men, sitting chairs along that hall, greeted me, riously, at my approach. I walked them with a sick feeling in my heart, signed the register that the suave clerk ded to me.

rom the dining-salon came a sud- burst of applause and drunken calls "Bravo! Bravo!" Somewhere a girl ghed with a high, shrill laughter. I ced at the clock on the wall over the k's desk. The hands pointed to four- ty. In New York the city, save for the d ones who hurry to and from work, at four-thirty. Only the central boulevards of is are noisy at eleven. New York knows gay music bright lights and dancing until one o'clock; Paris, e the war, closes its restaurants at nine-thirty has no public dancing. But Brussels, the center Belgium—Belgium torn and battered from four g years of war—dances on, and openly, at four- ky. Brussels, the crushed city of Europe, meets dawntime with mad laughter and hysterical . I went up to my room in the empty lift, y and puzzled and strangely hurt—I did not lerstand.

was not until noon that I left my room and went out through the city on a small tour of inspec- n that began at my hotel and ended in the office my only Belgian friend—one Major Pierre Blom- ert. I had met Major Blommaert in New York in tober; I had interviewed him then on the part yed by Belgium in the great war, and I had said d-by to him with no expectation of ever seeing n again. But when I arrived in Brussels I imme- tely hunted him up. For Major Blommaert had n, during the war, the Protestant chaplain in chief the Belgian armies. And I knew that he, more n any one, could show me the spirit of Brussels its true light.

My way to Major Blommaert's office on the Rue yale led up a steep hill and along a white paved siness street. I walked along up the hill in the e of a keen wind, looking about interestedly at the lendid buildings and the attractive shops. I ticed that the prices of the articles displayed in the op windows were fairly expensive—but the articles re articles of luxury. I saw fairy-like laces, wonder- l gowns, and expensive lingerie in those windows, d, strangely, I saw many displays of pastry and ndy. There is so little sugar in France that there e very few pastry and candy shops, and I had ought that the situation in Brussels was a like one. ut as time went on I discovered that there was parently more food in Belgium than in France. had butter, for the first time since leaving America, ith my meals. And I had sugar, too, and cakes, and ice cream. Even in the smaller towns I had sweets, and plenty of them.



Business section of Brussels

One does not see many American uniforms in Brussels. One or two, perhaps, but no more. There are British officers on the streets though, many of them, and Canadians, and Australians, and kilted Highlanders. The Highlanders are very popular in Brussels—they seem to be everywhere, the center of admiring and highly rouged feminine groups.

One sees, along the streets of Brussels, many ragged children. They are not more ragged than the children that I have seen in New York, but they are very pitiful. Curiously, one does not think of them as suffering Belgians. One thinks of them only as suffering children. Many of them beg for coppers on the street corners, beg with their grimy little faces lifted to yours and their small thin voices raised in inarticulate supplication.

There are girls on the street, too; not the brisk business girl, or the lady off for a day's shopping, that one sees in the American city—but a curiously furtive type of girl who is at the same time almost brazen. They wear chic dress and are vividly painted, and they saunter along trying, obviously, to catch the eye of the military stranger in their city. They are young, these girls—that is the infinite pity of it.

MAJOR BLOMMAERT was dictating a letter when I walked into his office. He shook hands with me warmly, though with a polite curiosity.

"You're not alone?" he questioned. "You're not here alone?"

"But I am," I laughed in answer. "Why not?"

"Here in Belgium—" began Major Blommaert. He paused embarrassedly. "In Belgium and France," he began again, after a minute, "a young girl does not travel alone. Our women do not go out upon the street alone. They do not go into the trains alone. They do not go about, unchaperoned, with a man!"

I realized why I had been the recipient of many odd looks as I answered.

"In America," I said, and with a shade of warmth, "a woman may go anywhere."

"Oh," said Major Blommaert, "America is different. America is a young, clean country. I—I am a Belgian, myself. But Belgium has not the ideals of America."

"You mean—?" I questioned.

"When a nation is healthy," Major Blommaert said slowly, "it respects its women!"

BRUSSELS does not respect its women. I found that out after two days in Brussels. A woman, alone, no matter how unobtrusive she may be, is spoken to rudely in nearly every public place. She is eyed, in tram-cars, in a way that makes American blood boil. And, knowing the Continental attitude, she cannot openly resent even the most obvious, though unspoken, insult.

The Belgian girls in the restaurants smoke. They drink, too—drink a great deal of wine. And they try to force themselves upon the attention of the masculine diners.

"It is," an army officer said to me, "as if Belgium has had the heart beaten out of her. It is as if the people of Belgium are bruised, mentally, morally, and physically. They no longer seem to care.

"For four years Belgium has been occupied by the German army. For four years the people of Belgium have lied to the Germans, and cheated them, and stolen from them. Now they lie and cheat and steal as a matter of course.

"Ninety-five per cent. of the working classes are on the borderland of tuberculosis. The better classes are run down, too. It isn't so much through poverty—it is because of oppression that they are in this way. They are in a different position from any other nation. You of America, you who are developed hundreds of years past Belgium, cannot understand!"

BRUSSELS has atmosphere—an atmosphere that is of the old world; that we, a young nation, cannot hope to imitate. I caught splendid glimpses of the city as I went from place to place. I went with the Boy who had come from Paris in the compartment with me. The Boy was not enjoying Brussels. He was very young and he had come to Brussels to work.

"Ze town ees queer," he told me. "I like eet—ze town—but—well, I do not dreenk. Nor gamble. An' ze girls, zey bozzer me! I wish," he looked at me sadly, "zat you would here stay, Mees Marguerite!"

I knew what the Boy was meeting. And I wondered why his firm had sent a youngster of under twenty to work in Belgium. But I didn't say anything. I went, instead, to dinners with him, and with him I visited various places of interest. It was the Boy who took me to see the beautiful public buildings—quite unlike the buildings in any other city—the Palais de Justice, with its bas reliefs of Minerva and its wonderfully carved square columns; the House of the King, the imposing Bourse; and, most inspiring of all, the Church of Saint Gudule. One can hardly think of sin as living in the same city with such a church—it seems like a wonderful hand pointing the way to God. For the architect had put reverence into every line of his work—reverence and understanding. Brussels has a charm that is the charm of age, of history. And yet, for all its newness, America never seemed so wonderful to me as it did while I was staying in Brussels.

For despite its old-world atmosphere and despite its charm, Brussels has lost that quality that would make the stranger—particularly the girl stranger—love it. Brussels is too hysterical, too busy groping after the something that it does not want, to be normal. One thinks of Brussels as a modern Babylon dancing on the brink of a volcano.

Belgium needs a new start—it needs to be rebuilt. The beautiful buildings of Brussels seem the only solidly tangible things in Brussels—and Brussels is the center of a nation. Characters need to be rebuilt, and homes, and morals—need to be rebuilt until they match the splendid architecture.

"IF YOU had a great deal of money what would you most like to do for your country?" I asked Major Blommaert one day. "What does Belgium really need, today?"

"You mean?" questioned Major Blommaert.

"America has sent food and clothing to Belgium," I told him, "when she was cold and hungry. But—"

"Just at present," he answered, "there are needs in Belgium greater than her need of food and clothing. Belgium needs a chance to clean up! And if I had the money I'd try to give her the chance."

This is my solution of the whole thing.

The Compelling Power of an Ideal

A CELEBRATED English writer, after many months of observation in Europe, has put on record this impression: "It was the high spirit, the intense desire to establish justice, and the conviction that they were fighting on God's side, that made the American troops win the war." This is the simple truth expressed by Mrs. Humphry Ward in a few words.

And now the end is at hand; the ideal has triumphed. And it is everywhere admitted among the Allied leaders that the spirit of our troops was communicated to their own soldiers and transformed the entire situation. Gloom was dispelled, down-heartedness disappeared and they swept on from victory to victory.

But the ideal which had been to us as a "pillar of fire" in the dark days of struggle did not end with the armistice. It broadened and expanded with the work of the Peace Conference. It glowed as a luminous banner amid all of the discussions. It transformed the Conference just as it had done the Allied armies, and gave it the broad view of international justice and righteousness.

There were obstacles in plenty to be overcome—the bitterness of hatred against a cruel but now helpless enemy; the blind desire to retaliate to the full for all that had been suffered at his hands; the passion for territorial acquisition. At every step implacable policies had to be tempered and modified and subdued to reasonableness. Fullest recognition is due to the Peace Conference for what it has accomplished under difficult conditions. The wise concessions that have been made will conduce to the stability of its work. The League of Nations, which had first created friction on both sides of the Atlantic, is now in a shape that meets the approval of all the powers interested. Instead of being impeded in his work for the completion of the League, it now proves that President Wilson has been aided and strengthened by criticism.

The Peace Congress takes up its task under strange conditions, at a time when, as Premier Lloyd George expressed it in his great speech to the Commons on April 16, in many lands "the foundations of society seem crumbling into dust." Mingling with the sounds of rejoicing over the brightening prospect comes the discord of widespread revolution and riot. Hunger and plague continue their devastating work. Bolshevism has plowed its way across many barriers and is yet unrestrained. Russia is still in turmoil, while the Central Powers seem to have been overtaken by the disaster they themselves invited. Yet, as we look back over these five months, it is surprising to note how difficulties have been overcome, some of them seemingly insurmountable. We can therefore hope that, with the signing of the Treaty of Peace, the first great step will have been taken toward the restoration of world order. The beneficent Power which overrules all human affairs will show those who are true to the high ideal a way to lead the nations out of the chaos and confusion. But this will only be if all who have the world's peace and highest welfare at heart remain true to the task they have undertaken. We have seen, as never before, the verification of the old Scripture that "without vision the people perish." Let our ideal, then, lead us to further the cause of righteousness and justice in all things, and we have nothing to fear from the future.

Farmers and the New Time

DAYLIGHT saving, which our city folks take to readily enough, doesn't appear to be so congenial to the farmers. Senator Capper's paper, which circulates largely among the agriculturists, gives the reasons for their reluctance to put the clocks ahead. Working by the new time, a Kansas farmer rises two hours before dawn and three before sunrise, thus adding an hour of darkness to his day. Four hours are needed to allow the dew to dry on the hay, and the new time gives only three hours for a forenoon's work. Shipping milk and other perishable food must be done an hour earlier to catch trains on new schedule. Children must dress for school by lamplight. Meetings and entertainments cause the loss of an hour of working time, and farmers going to town for market evenings must sacrifice a good working hour of daylight. Many farmers work by the old-time system and others by the new, causing difficulties with farm hands and loss of time. Threshing and other operations are seriously hindered, as in most crews there is division on the time schedule, causing the workers to quit while the sun is still three hours high.

As a result of these conditions, petitions for the repeal of the new time law are pouring in at the rate of 10,000 a week from the Middle West. Senator Capper will submit these to Congress should an extra session be called. It is estimated that the new time schedule, which in many parts of the country is regarded with favor, may cost the Western farmers a billion dollars in loss of working time and reduced production.

A New Ally for Prohibition

WHY should not the Prohibition leaders of the country, in order to carry out to its fullest extent the abolition of the saloon take up the problem of a substitute which must be put in its place?

The Christian Herald believes that a substitute for the saloon can be found. The most popular form of recreation today is the motion picture. It is capable of supplying the finest sort of argument against any attempted resurrection of the saloon.

A questionnaire sent to a large number of leading motion picture exhibitors throughout the country, with the view of learning the possible effect of Prohibition on that industry, produced surprising results. Seventy-two per cent. of the exhibitors expressed themselves heartily in favor of Prohibition, twenty-five per cent. were indifferent, and only three per cent. were opposed to Prohibition. The outcome of the inquiry is stated in these words: "The closing of the saloons removes the most formidable competitor of the motion picture business." It is confidently expected that after July 1 motion pictures will leap into new popularity.

There would seem to be a most providential opportunity here for the Prohibition forces to avail themselves of this powerful ally in the struggle that must follow their legislative victory, to maintain what they have fairly won. The Prohibition Party could not do a wiser thing than adapt the motion picture to their purpose.

The liquor interests do not want to stay dead. What chance of revival would they have if Prohibition were to put into the schools, the meeting-houses, the churches and Sunday schools on week days, the missions and every other available place—motion pictures showing the wickedness of the whole traffic which has just been abolished by national decree? These would drive home the lesson in vivid, realistic, living illustration.

John Barleycorn would not have a leg left to stand on if his inglorious career were shown to the multitudes who would crowd to see real good motion picture films dealing with the subject. The film would thus become an irresistible advocate of national sobriety and sound morals.

We commend the suggestion to all friends of Prohibition, and especially to those who have been active in the late successful campaign. It is one that strikes us as well worth trying.

Fellowship with Christ

WHILE the denominations are busily searching for a basis of church unity, we are reminded of an incident related by Henry F. Waring in his excellent book on "Christianity's Unifying Fundamentals." He tells how a pastor, being questioned theologically by one of his deacons, turned and asked: "Well, what to you is the heart of the whole thing?" "Fellowship with God that means a good life," was the reply. "But," said the pastor, "if one leads a good life and has such fellowship, but did not get it in the way you did, would you say that he didn't have it at all?" "No," was the prompt answer; "the important thing is the fellowship itself." "Good!" said the pastor, with enthusiasm; "hold on to that and you will find the guiding thread for the theological labyrinth of today."

This fellowship is the important thing. One may get it one way, and another in a different way; the essential point is not the method of getting it, but the actual possession of that sense of fellowship which means a godly life—fellowship with Christ as the cure for sinfulness and all it brings with it. With such fellowship assured, one can worship in any congregation of any denomination and have no compunctions or misgivings.

The Soul of Education

EDUCATION without spiritual understanding is an empty shell. German Kultur, riding ruthlessly over the rights of a world and even yet unable to fathom the depths of its own fall, is abundant evidence of this.

Here in America we have the best free public sch in the world. We did not invent the public sch but we have set the pace for all lands in its deve ment. Into our land laws, into all our state co tutions, we have written indelibly our conviction every child has a right to an education. The q response to training of our National Army, its re ness to submit to intelligent discipline, its stri power, all attest the fundamental soundness of schools. But while our schools are not godless, th cannot be, under our laws, regular, efficient, conv ing instruction in the religious truths which unde all that is permanent in our civilization.

If we may not teach religion in our public sch where shall we do it?

There are three plans:

One contemplates a rebuilding of the Sunday sch along lines of proven pedagogical soundness, w longer sessions, trained, possibly paid, teachers, an course more widely instructive than the simple less taught in thirty minutes which we have in most of Sunday schools today.

A second would stimulate the homes to become, they once were, definite links in the secular and ligious education of the children. Lincoln learned read at his mother's knee, and he learned faith w his letters. But many mothers of today turn th children over to the day school for secular teachi to the Sunday school for religious truth, and thi they do well if they read and interpret intelligen the golden text on a picture card. The fathers do better.

The third is the Gary plan, under which the ch dren are turned over to the churches, each child the church of his parents' choice, to follow regular each school day, a course in religion as comprehensi and complete as the course in English or mathema ics. This puts the problem up to the churches whe it belongs. In Gary the churches united to give t best course they could, and it has cost about $7 p child per year, with an enrolment of 800.

It is probable that all of these three plans could b united, or followed simultaneously to advantage. B one of them must be followed if our children are graduate from school with that well-rounded development, that broad vision of life and its meaning, whic alone will fortify them against the unreasoning an radical movements that seek to destroy all that good in civilization.

The Friends of China's Orphans

SOME thirteen years have elapsed since the grea famine in China, the climax of a series of visita tions, the last of which resulted in the foundatio of the Christian Herald's Orphan Work in that country. Appeal was made to our readers, with the resul that this journal undertook the support of about 2,00 orphans, distributed among a number of missionar stations, the whole work being under an interdenominational missionary committee at Chinkiang. During all the years that have passed, those orphans hav been a loving charge on the hearts of their America friends. Many of the children have grown up to self-respecting and self-supporting Christian manhood and womanhood. Some have been trained as teacher and pastors among their own people, while all hav received such training as would qualify them to tak their part in the world's work. And now, with it long task of service fully accomplished, the committe in Chinkiang, through its treasurer, Maurice A Walker, announces that its members feel that th time has arrived for them to be released from their labors, and that in view of the comparatively smal number of children who still remain under tutelage the support can be forwarded direct to the mission having them under care. The letter adds:

"Only two members of the original committee ar now living in Chinkiang, which is also another strong reason why this committee should now close up it work. "In doing so we desire to express our high appreciation of the splendid assistance given by the Christian Herald and its readers to the missions in China so generously all these years in caring for these many orphans. As a committee and as individuals we are glad to have been associated with you in this work. On behalf of the orphans we tender you our heartiest thanks."

In replying to this communication from the committee, we have conveyed to its members the sincere thanks of every reader of the Christian Herald who has been associated in this beautiful enterprise. The members of the committee, during all the years of the work, made many sacrifices to give it their best attention, and they did well. They deserve the gratitude of every supporter of Christian missions.

Peril and Promise of the Printed Page

An Inductive Argument for the Religious Paper

By REV. JOHN ROACH STRATON, D.D.[*]

IN THE fifteenth century there was a German lad who had the euphonious name of Johann Gensfleisch. Translated into plain English, this means John Gooseflesh. It is said that John w one day playing near a pot of boiling dye, with wh his father was preparing to color some skins. H had cut the letters of his name from the bark of a e, and was spreading them out to form his name, w n one of them accidentally fell into the pot of b ing dye. Quickly John plunged in his fingers to re ue the letter. Finding it very hot, he more q kly turned it loose. It fell upon one of the white el s which were waiting to be dyed, and when John li d the block away he saw a beautiful purple "H" ling up at him. That was the first letter ever p ted on the continent of Europe! Whether he ired the marks on the skin or meditated ruefully n the marks which his irate father might make n his own skin because of the accident, we do not w. But we do know that this incident, or someng else, started the young man to thinking. In year 1450, we find a printing press working in inz, under the direction of Johann Gutenberg, o had changed his name from Gooseflesh, by iling himself of an old German law which perted a child to take his mother's name instead of father's, if he desired. His discovery of the art printing revolutionized the world.

The power of the printing press rests upon the truth t our thought determines our life. It is a dictum secular philosophy and of Sacred Writ that "as a n thinketh in his heart, so is he." Our being is the reflex of our thinking.

Notice, now, that our reading today in large meae determines our thinking. The printed leaf d the throbbing life are vitally connected. "As a n thinketh, so is he." And as a man reads, so nks he. Now, we can eliminate logically here, and simply that as a man reads, so is he. It is imssible to overestimate the direct and powerful luence of reading upon the life. The psychological son standing behind this truth is the interesting t that our mental states are much more deeply ected by what comes through the eye than by what mes through the ear. An impression through the e is seized upon by the creative imagination, which nds to hold it, to impress it indelibly upon the brain sue, and thus, through the law of suggestion, to ke it a part of the permanent life.

HERE are many illustrations of this influence of reading over life. The case of Martin Luther is instance in point. The Protestant Reformation ally began at Erfurt when Luther, rummaging rough the library there, ran across a dusty copy of e Scripture, opened it and read "The just shall live faith." When that line fell upon the retina of ther's eye, the Protestant Reformation became tentially a fact. The truth haunted him, as the ory of his life makes plain; wherever he went that e from the printed page went with him. The words ated before his vision and sounded in his ears. The st shall live, not by the forms and ceremonies of great external church—"the just shall live by faith!" uther went to Rome, hoping that a visit to the other church would strengthen his faith, but as he ent up the steps of the Lateran, surrounded by the remonies, grandeur and gilt, these words came to im with insistent force, "The just shall live by ith." And so his life was turned into absolutely ew channels. And the world was revolutionized by he reading of a single line!

There is a well-known but remarkable instance of ow one book changes a life and then leads to other fe-changing volumes. A little work entitled "The ruised Reed," written by an old Puritan doctor, ell into the hands of Richard Baxter and led him to hrist as his Saviour and to a great life of service in the inistry. Baxter then wrote "The Call to the nconverted," which is still in circulation and doing ood to millions of men. Philip Doddridge got hold f this book of Baxter's, and it led him into a broader nowledge, a richer faith and a deeper experience of he things of God. Then Doddridge wrote a book alled "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the oul," which book fell into the hands of William Vilberforce, and so impressed him that he wrote a ook called "Practical Christianity." And this book, n turn, made its way far down into the sunny Isle f Wight and there thrilled the heart of Leigh Richmond. Richmond then wrote the "Dairyman's Daughter," which book has been translated into more than fifty languages of the earth, working wherever it goes an immeasurable influence for the extension of the Gospel. Still, again, this book of Wilberforce made its way into a secluded parish in Scotland, and its reading worked an epoch in the life of a young man who was afterward to thrill the world with his glorious ministry—the eloquent Thomas Chalmers. There it is, not a break in the chain: Baxter, Doddridge, Wilberforce, Richmond, Chalmers, and after these names another word needs to be added—eternity! For the influence of their works will never cease.

THE world is flooded as never before with vile and unwholesome literature. Let us beware lest the best be neglected, and the taste of our young people be vitiated by the worst that comes from the press. If ever our Christian homes needed to be guarded in any one particular, it is at this point. Recently four young boys were arrested in Kentucky for burglary and murder. They were caught in a house, and in the excitement they killed the owner. Their ages ranged from fourteen to eighteen! When searched, their pockets were found filled with dime novels! Their crime was easily understood in the light of that discovery.

Recently a sign appeared in one of our book stores, "Hurt Books for Sale Cheap." Books slightly soiled they were, books a little out of season, and pushed aside for new favorites, but "hurt books" (probably the maker of the sign was intent upon brevity), as if they really felt their being crowded out, seemed an odd way of putting it. Yet, if books did possess feelings, there might be many "hurt" books in all our homes—volumes pure, sweet and uplifting, pushed aside for the latest, trashy "fad," not worthy to be laid upon a lady's table or in a young lad's hands! There is a great responsibility upon parents to put good reading matter into their homes. One leaf may alter a whole life! In God's name, then, let the leaf be good!

The newspapers of today are an especially powerful factor both for good and for evil. The history of the newspaper—from the first publication of the Peking Tchingpao ("News of the Capital") in the year 713 of the T'ang dynasty, through the story of the Acta Diurna ("Daily Occurrences") of ancient Rome, down to the present time—is full of interest.

"Public Occurrences," begun in Boston in 1690, was the first American newspaper. With this beginning, our papers have grown in number and spread over the country, until now America, with only five per cent. of the population of the world, has forty per cent. of the newspapers and magazines of the entire world. In 1900 carefully gathered statistics from every land showed 50,000 papers published on earth, and the United States had 21,000 of them! During the last half century the number of papers in the United States has been doubling each ten years, until the census of 1900 showed an aggregate number of copies issued each year of 8,168,148,749. At the same rate of increase we now have at least 15,000,000,000 copies each year. That is probably enough to put a wrapping of newspapers around the entire earth! We could cover the whole surface of the globe with the printed pages that are flowing yearly from the busy presses of our land!

THINK now of the enormous possibilities of that number of papers for either evil or good! It is said that Gutenberg once dreamed that, as he wrought in his cell at St. Aborsgot Monastery, he heard a voice warning him that the power of his invention would help bad men to propagate their wickedness and to spread evil over the earth. The voice further told him that the time would come when men would profane the art of printing and that posterity would curse the invention. Gutenberg then hurriedly took a hammer in his dream and began breaking the type into pieces; but another voice came to him and bade him desist from the work of destruction and go on with his invention. The voice told him that though it might be the occasion of much evil, God would use it as a fountain of infinite good, and through it finally give the right ultimate victory in all the earth.

This dream of Gutenberg's is surely realized in the modern newspapers, for it is difficult at times to determine whether their influence is prevailingly for evil or for good. As we think of the good we should rejoice that our American newspapers are getting more and more on the right side in the great moral awakening now in progress for the cleansing of our business and political life from dishonesty, corruption and graft. The editors of our country, for the most part, have been fearless and aggressive in their denunciation of these evils, and they have rendered the public a magnificent service in their able and courageous battle for the right. Public opinion is to the body social what the conscience is to the individual, and our great papers today are the molders of public opinion.

I venture the assertion that there has never been in the history of the world a finer constructive influence for righteousness and truth than that which has been exerted by the American papers in connection with the world war. The way in which our great papers drew together with a common spirit and a common vision, as the moral issues at stake in the conflict became more and more apparent, was refreshing and encouraging to the optimistic mind. There was scarcely a discordant note in the first-class papers of the entire country, but their news columns and their editorial pages throbbed and vibrated with the hot pulse-beat of righteous indignation against the monstrous wrongs perpetrated upon an unsuspecting civilization by the outlaw nations of Central Europe.

The instant response of the secular press to the high ethical ideals lifted up by our President gave a supreme illustration of the fact that in its profounder depths the American heart is sound and American morals are true, because the newspapers are the greatest reflectors of the sentiments and thought of all the people.

On the evil side, however, there are several counts which frankness and understanding must make against the average paper of today. The Sunday edition of the newspaper is a great evil. It prevents the employees, especially the army of newsboys who sell and distribute the papers, from attending Sunday school and church. Not only so, but the Sunday newspapers prevent many of their readers from attending divine worship by presenting to them a fascinating counter-attraction, and thus building up slowly but surely the non-churchgoing habit.

Further, though there is usually considerable good matter in the Sunday papers, by far the greater proportion of it has to do with the same exciting, nerve-racking, heart-depressing, worldly interests, which have worn out the people, body and mind, during the week. The average Sunday newspaper is a conglomeration of advertisements, market reports, baseball slang, political hurrah, society scandals, murders, silly sentiment, Buster Brown humor, and utilitarian ethics—a dose sufficient to paralyze the moral energies of the people for the following week.

THE glaring evil in much of the secular printed matter of today makes the religious paper a necessity in every home. The poison of evil in the printed page must have its antidote in the inspiration of the good. The religious newspaper is undeniably a strong force for unalloyed good. Its regular visits to the home are most helpful.

This truth was once impressed upon me in a striking way. I was in the city of Atlanta, Ga., as a visitor, and stopped at the post office to inquire for my mail. When I called my name, the gentleman at the window made an inquiry about my parents, and I learned then that he had been a boyhood acquaintance in my old home in Greensboro, Ga. He told me in the course of the conversation that he had always felt very much indebted to our family, because of the fact that my mother had been instrumental in leading him to Christ. He stated that when he was a raw country boy, living in Greene county, he came each week to our home to deliver country produce, and that my mother saved the copies of a religious paper and gave them to this young man each week, and he said that reading the papers led to his conversion and entrance into the church. At the time when I talked to him he was holding a position of high trust and responsibility in the Atlanta post office, and was an officer in one of the leading churches of the city.

How desirable it would be to us all if into each one of our homes there might come at stated intervals some clean, noble friend, whose presence would cheer, whose conversation would instruct, and whose ideals would inspire every member of the household; a friend who would advise truly and who would guide well! We may each have such a friend in the visits of the religious journal; and if such papers were in every home, the great truth that "as a man thinks, so is he," and as he reads, so does he think, would vindicate itself in nobler characters and better lives.

Note the Pointed Corn

Why Corns Hurt

Note this diagram picture of a corn. Note its conical shape. The cause of the corn is pressure. And pressure makes it hurt. The point of the corn is pushed into the nerves.

Applying a Blue-jay plaster instantly removes the pressure. Note the felt pad (A) in the picture below. We apply no anesthetic. The pad gives barefoot comfort in the tightest shoe.

But that is temporary. One should not continue a pad. The corn should be quickly ended.

The bit of B&B wax in the center of the pad does that (as noted in illustration below). In two days, usually, the whole corn disappears. Only rare corns need a second application.

That's the great reason for Blue-jay. It stops the pain, then ends the corn. And it wraps the corn so the action is undisturbed.

Then the action of the B&B wax is centered on the corn. Held there by the rubber coated adhesive tape which wraps comfortably around the toe. Healthy tissue is not affected.

These facts cannot be true of liquid applications.

Those are the reasons why millions of people have adopted the Blue-jay method. It is scientific, quick, comfortable and certain.

Keeping corns is folly when this easy way can end them. Treating them in cruder ways is inexcusable.

For your own sake, convince yourself by applying Blue-jay to one corn.

ending the Hill of the Lord

UNDAY. Ps. 24 : 3. "Who shall ascend the hill of the Lord, or who shall stand in his holy place?" When Dante begins to make the ascent to Paradise he has to mount steps at the beginning of the jour- There is first a step of white le. Then there is a step which ugh, broken and uneven. And , there is a step of flaming red hyry. The imagery is extraordi- y vivid, and the vividness is surely led by its truth. If we wish to d the hill of the Lord, these are first three steps which set us on the . Any other beginning will lead a road which winds around the of the hill and never turns upward e summit.

e begin with the step of white ble. It is the symbol of purity sincerity. It corresponds to the ptural symbol of the white robe. hill-pilgrim must be clean. Out- every Moslem mosque there is ision made for every worshiper to his feet. We cannot possibly take first step to the white marble unless e mighty cleansing Minister will iously make us clean. "Lord, if wilt, thou canst make me clean!" h is ever the cry of the pilgrim whose is turned to the holy hill. "I will, hou clean!" Such is ever the swift onse of the Saviour. "His blood make the vilest clean, his blood ils for me."

rom the white marble we pass to the gh and broken step. It is the broken contrite heart. It is a very true searching insight which prompts ate to put the really vital penitence the cleansing. The broken step es after the white marble. It is y when we are forgiven that we really in to see the deadly horribleness of . And then comes the penitence, the row which is itself a minister of a secrated life.

nd then we reach the third step of flaming red porphyry. And this is kindling of love. It is the red glow sacrificial affection. "We love Him ause he first 'loved us.'" Yes, even love is the child of his love, a little born of the central sun. "God is ve," and when a kindred love is zing in our hearts we can make fine gress up the hill.

Friends of Jesus

ONDAY. John 15 : 14. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I mmand you." Our Lord Jesus here ers to us one of the most exalted priv- ges that could be imagined, the priv- ge of personal, intimate friendship th himself. What more exalted honor ld there be than that of being a iend of Jesus? If we happen to have a tle acquaintance with some great n, how we love to speak of that man "my friend——!" But this verse lls us how any one of us can have a ore exalted honor than that of being e friend of the greatest man on earth -the honor of being an intimate friend the Lord of lords and King of kings. We do well to deeply ponder the "if" this verse, "Ye are my friends, if do whatsoever I command you." sk yourself, Am I a friend of Jesus? es, if you are doing whatsoever he mmands you. No, if you are not oing whatsoever he commands you. o profession of loyalty to him, no or- odoxy of creed, no rapturous experi- ce will make you a friend of Jesus; st simple, homely, every-day obedi- ce in all walks of life to his will as e expresses it in his Word. This and is alone makes us friends of Jesus.

And we are not only to do the things hich he commands; we are to do all e things which he commands. While e are glad to do many things which he commands, there may be some things which he commands which we are unwilling to do. Never mind how unwilling you are to do it, do it if he commands it. If we do not do it we are not friends of Jesus. But when we make a full surrender to him and stand ready to do anything that he commands, he "no longer" calls us "servants"—it would be an honor to be called even that—but no, he will not call us that; he calls us by that wonderfully significant name, "friends."

When we are thus admitted to the circle of his friends, he declares to us the richest secrets of his thought, "All things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you."

A Reconstructed Earth

TUESDAY. Rev. 21 : 5. "And He that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new." There are two ways of making things new. One is to wipe the slate clean and start again. This is what occurred at the Flood. The other is to introduce new principles of life and wait for them to develop. This is what God did when Christ came. He came to show mankind the better way to live and the better way to die. His life is our model. But of what use is a model without the power to reproduce it? It mocks us with its excellence. It is at once our glory and our despair. When we see that pure, brave life of Jesus, lived on the heights of holiness, we cry, "Who is sufficient for these things?" Our cry falls on a Brother's ears, and finds response in a Father's heart, and he answers our cry with his eternal offer of help.

An engine, however perfect, is useless without motive power. Weak and helpless are we all without the spirit of the new life. Wanted, an indwelling Spirit, to cause us to walk in the way of God's commandments. This is a want as old as human yearning, as deep as hunger, as keen as thirst. Where is that Spirit and how shall we avail ourselves of his help? There is such a Spirit in the world. He brooded over the formless void in creation, and all things were new. He came like a rushing wind into an assembly of disciples gathered in an upper room, and they were animated with new purposes and armed with new zeal. He descended like a dove upon a young man at his baptism, and from that moment he was absolutely free and absolutely fearless. From that moment he began to preach the new evangel of peace on earth among men of good will. The words which promise peace sound strange with the echoes of battle still fresh in our ears, but they sounded stranger still to those who first heard them. It was a new Gospel to them, but it had within it the power of creating a new order. It gave men a new idea of the nearness of God, and it gave them new principles of human conduct. The world already knew the principles of obedience to duty, but only the saintliest and most radiant of spirits had caught any glimpse of the law of self-denial, the law of gentle service, and the law of love. The beginning of the new heaven and the new earth is in the new man with a new Master, a new motive, a new standard of greatness, and a new passion to master the principles of the fine art of holy living.

Isaiah's League of Nations

WEDNESDAY. Isa. 2 : 4. "And Jehovah will judge between the nations, and will decide concerning many peoples." A League of Nations is not a new idea. Henry of Navarre outlined one. Grotius, the historian, mentions it. Kant, the great philosopher, discussed it. Rousseau projected it in his writings. William Penn, the genial Quaker and friend of mankind, had a League of Nations in his plan of a new country. Abbe de Saint-Pierre and many eminent clergymen have proclaimed such a League, and Dante in his writings referred to it many times.

But long before any of these thinkers and statesmen mentioned the League, Isaiah proclaimed it, and the main difference between his League and all the others mentioned is stated in this passage, where he puts Jehovah at the head of the League, and makes him the judge and arbiter of the destinies of the nations.

Isaiah's League says that the nations must come to God and walk in his ways. Will labor and capital do that? Will the different political parties stop their political bickerings, and walk in God's ways? Will the different nationalities sink their racial prejudices and agree to act for a common good? Will the daily papers that fight one another and print unnecessary sensations and call it news change their habits and walk in Jehovah's ways and let him map out the plan of a League?

This is too big a business to be entrusted to mere men for planning and carrying out. Men are not wise enough nor good enough to carry this gigantic thing through successfully. The God of all the earth can be trusted to do right.

The first thing to do, according to Isaiah, is for the nations to acknowledge God, and place him at the head of the table. Surely, if the world ever needed divine wisdom, it needs it now. To neglect the source of power at this juncture in the history of the race is the greatest folly. It is safe to say that no League of Nations that leaves God out of its constitution will endure the test of man's selfishness. Wars will not cease, and the weapons of warfare will not be beaten into implements of industry until the nations acknowledge God as the supreme Ruler in the affairs of men.

The Greatness of Small Things

THURSDAY. Matt. 13 : 31. "The kingdom of heaven is like a grain of mustard seed." There is much in little. An anthill and a beehive are packed full of inspiration and suggestion. "Consider the lilies of the field." "Behold the fowls of the air." God is in small things. Omnipotence is in the diminutive. The infinite is throbbing in the mustard seed. The wisdom of the ant, industry of the bee, development of the flower, instinct of the bird, glisten of the dewdrop and all the heaven with which the earth is filled are eloquent of Kingdom values and Creator design. In the last analysis the mountains reduce to grains, the oceans to drops, and the world is beautiful in its vastness because it is first beautiful in its atoms. God manifests himself in the thunders and the zephyrs, in the mighty wind and the still, small voice.

A word in season, a little deed of kindness, a look, may be instrumental in starting movements of reformation and giving rise to occasions for emancipations. Despise not your grains of truth. All truth is God's truth. Do not condemn your small loaves and fishes of talents and gifts. Yield them to the Master of all loaves and fishes and he will bless them. Take the mustard seeds of your hopes and aspirations to God. The result will be a tree of much leafage, blossom and fruit.

The Divine-Human Servant

FRIDAY. John 13 : 4, 5. "He riseth from supper, . . . and began to wash the disciples' feet." We would fall short of the full meaning of this action of our Lord by saying that he only wanted to teach the disciples a lesson of humility and service. This act of Christ was a link in the chain of his redeeming acts, and has its proper place in that state of self-abasement in which he wrought out the great salvation. The pride and exaltation which men willingly learned from Satan in the beginning, which gave rise to the extravagant notions that caused them to set aside the divine ordinance in Eden, which has since filled this world with the strife and malice, the envies and jealousies, the grinding ambitions and haughty self-assertions of men, had to be atoned for by its very opposite—unselfish humiliation, willingly assumed and cheerfully borne. To this task the Saviour had, indeed, given his entire life, but among the many acts in which he who was in the form of God showed himself in fashion as a man, this is one of the most illustrious and significant. No sooner had the Saviour beheld the sinful ambition which that very evening had cropped out among the future pillars of his Church, than he substituted for their sin his divine atonement, in order that this trespass might not be charged against them. This act is the ground of evangelical absolution especially from all the jealousies that exist and continuously arise among the laborers in Christ's Church. It was required for our complete justification; it is one of the stones in the foundation on which we build our faith in the forgiving mercy of God and our hope of life everlasting. Into this act of our Redeemer we sink our own guilty ambition, envy, jealousy, and selfishness of whatever form, that they may be drowned as in the depths of the sea. Next, we shall use this striking symbolical action of the Lord as the divine model for all true greatness in the kingdom of Christ on earth. If any one will be Christ's, he must have the spirit of Christ, and do as Christ did.

The Second Appearing

SATURDAY. Matt. 24 : 44. "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh." As sure as the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us and we beheld his glory, Christ is coming a second time, personally and victoriously. There is no uncertainty about his coming again, except in the time. The effort to fix the date has caused mortal mistakes and mischief. As the first coming was a personal visible appearance, in like manner as he went up into heaven, he will return to reign. John said that every eye shall see him, and Jesus, before the high priest, exclaimed, "Ye shall see the Son of man coming in power and great glory." How can any one so interpret these plain words of the Saviour as to make them mean the coming of the Holy Spirit into the hearts of believers? The Comforter has a special mission to convict, convert, sanctify and apply divine power to the saving and cleansing of the human heart. Christ's second coming is to inaugurate his kingdom in this world, to create a new heaven and a new earth.

The Holy Spirit dwelt in the hearts of the prophets and the people in Old Testament times. Perhaps some said in those days, "Where is the promise of his coming? He is with us now in spiritual presence; why look for a literal, personal appearing?" Following such advice the Church would have died and prophecy perished. Is it not equally fallacious to consider the second coming as a spiritual manifestation which has always been in the hearts of Christ's followers? Why did our Lord say, "Watch and be ready," if there was no other coming except his spiritual presence, which was in their hearts at that very moment? Why did he mention some signs as evidence that his second coming was near if there was to be no visible appearance, nothing but what the Comforter bestowed at Pentecost? E. W. C.

Grow "Younger"

Younger in Body, Younger in Spirit, Younger in Ambition, Younger in Every Characteristic that Gives Greater Earning and Living Power, Greater Thought Power, Greater Pleasure Obtaining Power and Greater Health Promoting Power

THE number of years a man has lived does not tell how old or young he is. A man is as old or as young as his energy, his vitality, his capacity for work and play, his resisting power against disease and fatigue. A man is only as old or as young as his memory power, will power, sustained-thought power, personality power, concentration power and brain power. He is only as old or as young as his digestive power, his heart power, his lung power, his kidney power, his liver power. Age is measured by the age of our cells, tissues and organs, and not by the calendar!

Cultivate the Cells

Everybody knows that the body and brain are made up of millions of tiny cells. We can be no younger than those cells are young. We can be no more efficient in any way than those cells are efficient. We can be no more energetic than the combined energy of those cells.

By conscious cultivation of these cells, it is natural as the law of gravity that we become more efficient, more alive, more energetic, more ambitious, more enthusiastic, more youthful. By consciously developing the cells in our stomachs we must improve our digestion. By consciously developing the cells in the heart we must increase its strength in exact proportion. By consciously developing the brain cells the result can only be multiplied brain power—and so with every organ in the body.

What we are and what we are capable of accomplishing depends entirely and absolutely on the degree of development of our cells. They are the sole controlling factors in us. We are only as young and as great and as powerful as they are.

There Is No Fraud Like Self-Deception

You may think you are young, strong, brainy, energetic, happy, yet when compared with other men or women, you are old, weak, dull, listless and unhappy. You do not know what you are capable of accomplishing because you have not begun to develop the real vital powers within you. The truth is you are only a dwarf in health and mind when you can easily become a giant through conscious development of every cell, tissue and organ in your body and brain.

Conscious Evolution

Conscious Evolution must not be confused with Darwinian evolution, nor should Conscious Evolution be confused with Hindoo philosophies, auto suggestion, self hypnosis, gymnastics, or mere physiology, anatomy, histology, theosophy, morphology, medicine, pathology, exercise, New Thought, Christian Science, calesthenics, embryology or psychology.

Conscious Evolution is not an occult science, nor a metaphysical science, nor a divine science, nor a spiritual science, nor a material science, nor is Conscious Evolution a symbolical science, nor a hoping, wishing, longing and dreaming philosophy.

Conscious Evolution must not be confused with any of the conceptually symbolic systems of the secondary and tertiary type, and Conscious Evolution cannot be comprehended in any of the present day concepts in science and philosophy, including the science of biology.

Conscious Evolution must not be confused with any present day philosophies or sciences of a material or mental character.

Conscious Evolution cannot be understood by physicians, psychologists, physical culturists, philosophers, chemists, cosmologists or biologists of the present day Conscious Evolution is a new and original science, an exact science, a demonstrable science—a science of the evolution of and through Conscious Energy—a science of the Ultimate.

Conscious Evolution is the beginning of a new evolutionary era for the human race.

Conscious Evolution is the way and means to arouse, inspire, lead, advance and raise humanity to a higher level—mentally, physically, physiologically, psychologically, evolutionarily and creatively.

The aim of Conscious Evolution is to give the highest freedom from failure, misery, sin weakness and evolutionary bankruptcy, and to give the highest liberty to enjoy the full life, the better life, the higher life, the persistent life—the eternal life.

The aim of Conscious Evolution is to ascertain all of the truths of the universe—all of the principles, all of the laws and all of the elements and factors of existence—and to so employ them as to gain the greatest intensity or volume of the greatest good, as will harmonize with the Ultimate.

Conscious Evolution aims to establish conceptual law and order, through a higher consciousness of the principles of all phenomena. It aims to establish a concrete and definite and invariable realization of truth as it is.

Conscious Evolution aims to increase the power of each individual to adopt truth for self and to adopt self to truth.

Conscious Evolution overcomes weakness through power, feebleness through energy, fear through courage, nervousness through self-reliance, illness through health, misery through happiness, delusion through truth, failure through success, by higher personal evolution through the creative power of the internal creator of the mind and body. Conscious Evolution requires no faith, for it uses a specific agent or avenue or means for the definite purpose of reaching the creative forces of each individual, and evolutionarily activating them, thus creating a rise in personal creation, through the process of evolution of the individual.

Conscious Evolution is based on the discovery of the origin, nature and laws of the LIFE PRINCIPLE. It is based on the new and demonstrable conception of the LIFE "SUBSTANTIA."

The aim of Conscious Evolution is to enable individuals personally to rise to the highest planes of existence, through action governed by a realization of principles and laws of demonstrable and utlimate truth.

The aim of Conscious Evolution is to raise humanity to the highest possible plane in mind, health, civilization, laws, justice, science, philosophy, evolution, creation, destiny and the Ultimate.

By accelerating the development of the powers within you, you can a become younger, as you grow older—yes, younger in every way that will con to your health, happiness and prosperity.

Conscious Evolution—the Secret

Swoboda proves that Conscious Evolution gives energy and vitality to digestive power to spare, self-reliance to spare, and gives many other de characteristics to spare. He proves that Conscious Evolution makes people proof, fatigue-proof. He maintains that to possess sufficient vitality and and to keep the body in normal health under the most favorable conditions more health prosperity than to have only enough money from day to day to current expenses. Great reserve health, great reserve energy is what we acquire if we are to succe nullify the ravages of time, a easily overcome every a condition and thus enjoy the efit of our resources, the ben our health power and the a tage of our energy.

Beware of Health Poverty

As Swoboda says, "there are viduals who seek work only their last cent is gone. Like individuals live from minut minute and from day to seeking health and energy on they need them badly. scious Evolution is for them everyone. It is a simple, tific and practical system means of which every part of brain and body is energ strengthened, awakened, so we become possessed of a s health and mentality—the boda kind of health and tality. Conscious Evolution for good fortune by developi resources and the ability and of personality.

Strange as it may seem, this lutionary method of conscio awakening and developing w ened and lifeless cells require drugs, medicines or apparat any kind. It does not re dieting, deep breathing, exce exercising, cold baths, elec or massage. It takes only minutes a day, yet so startli the effect of Swoboda's sy that you begin to feel you renewed, vitalized, re-ener after the very first day.

What Others Have to Say

"Conscious Evolution has done all for me that you promised and I am simply radiating good health. I can hardly believe it myself, it has made such a great change in me. I am in better condition than I have been for twenty years and am chock full of energy and ambition. Tasks that were a burden to me in the past are now easy and a pleasure. I have no money to burn or throw to the birds, but if you were to offer me one thousand dollars in good hard cash and put me back where I was before beginning your system, I would say, 'Nothing doing.' I enjoy the work you have mapped out for me and am impatient to get at it."

"I SHALL BE SIXTY-SIX YEARS OLD NEXT AUGUST, and if you were to see me right now you would say 'forty,' and, as a fact, I am better, stronger, and have more energy than the average man at forty. I have only you and your system to thank for these things, and I want to thank you from the very bottom of a grateful heart for what you have done for me. I am a man now in every sense of the word, whereas I was only a fraction of a man and rather a small fraction before profiting through Conscious Evolution."

"The strangest part of it all is that my hearing is greatly improved. The muscles of my shoulders, back and abdomen are immense, and I have forgotten that I have a liver, kidneys, heart, or any other organs, except my stomach which makes a loud call three times a day. I have lost all desire for stimulants."

"I AM SEVENTY-ONE YEARS OF AGE, and in three weeks your system has apparently made a new man of me. I am so enthusiastic over Conscious Evolution that it is difficult for me to control myself, and not do more than you say. I want to thank you for the interest you are taking in my case. When I wrote you for your instructions I was in a very desperate condition. I have never been sorry for one minute that I have written you. On the contrary, I want to thank you for what you are doing for me. I am getting along fine; I am a wonder to myself. It does not seem possible that there could be such a change in any one in such a short time."

"When I tell some of my friends how quickly I was benefited by Conscious Evolution, they do not believe me. They think I exaggerate."

"One year ago I was an old man at forty; to-day I am a at forty-one."

"I must state that the principle of your system is the most sci and at the same time the simplest, I have ever heard. You do no represent one single word in your advertising."

"Just think of it, five weeks ago I was ashamed of my phy to-day I am almost proud of it; I am delighted with Con Evolution."

"My reserve force makes me feel that nothing is in sible, my capacity both physically and mentally is incre daily."

"I am very thankful that the Lord rected me to Conscious Evolution thro the Christian Herald."

GROWING 200,000 ACRES OF WHEA

By ROBERT H. MOULTON

ONE result of the government's efforts to increase the production of wheat during the last two years has been the creation of the largest wheat farm in the world, some 200,000 acres of Indian lands in Montana and Wyoming. If this farm yields only twenty-five bushels per acre—the average yield for the entire country is twenty-eight bushels—it will mean 5,000,000 bushels of wheat added to the 1919 crop, which at the government price of $2.26 per bushel would be worth $11,300,000.

There are two other remarkable things about this farm: in the first place, it was conceived and is being managed by one man, Thomas D. Campbell, formerly a North Dakota farmer. In the second place, not a single horse will be in use on this huge farm. Instead, huge tractors, the largest ever built, will do all the work of plowing, seeding, and harvesting. They will also do it much quicker than has ever been done by the use of horses. As a matter of fact, without tractors it would be impossible to run this big farm at all. The number of horses or other animals required would be prohibitive, to say nothing of the expense of feeding them and the extra farm labor to handle them.

The farm has been divided into units of 5,000 acres each, and to each unit has been assigned one giant tractor, with a dozen other tractors held in reserve in case of accident. Each unit also has its own group of permanent buildings, modernly equipped, and is under the direct charge of a competent farm manager. Under this manager is a general foreman, who will see to hiring the help and getting the work done.

But over all stands Mr. Campbell, who is constantly on the go from unit to unit, supervising the more important features of the entire job.

In the beginning Mr. Campbell figured out the whole thing; how much machinery would be required, and how much time should be allowed for plowing, seeding, harvesting, and so on. Everything is done on a schedule, and as this is dry-farming land, no allowance has to be made for bad weather. The greater part of the plowing was done last fall and the remainder will be done this spring. Some idea of the capacity of the huge tractors may be gained from the fact that last fall fourteen of them plowed more than 350 acres in one day, none of which had ever before been broken by the plow.

Before he could lease the Indian lands Mr. Campbell had to make arrangements with Secretary of the Interior Lane. Under the old system of leasing these lands the lessee agreed to give the Indians fifty an acre for all wheat lands, and from six to t cents an acre for all grazing lands. Under the ment with Mr. Campbell the Indians will receiv tenth of the crop during the first five years an fifth of the crop during the second five-year p at the end of which time the lease expires. I twenty bushels of wheat are raised to the ac Indians will receive times as much as received formerly wheat lands, and twenty times as as they got for gr lands. Furthern the contract pro that all the la shall be fenced barbed-wire, fences, together wi buildings and othe provements that m placed upon the l shall become the p erty of the Indian the expiration of lease.

Giant tractors preparing wheat land for the sowing

It is to the unbou credit of Mr. Cam that when he went this enterprise he actuated purely by triotic motives—to the government in its efforts to stimulate food duction. He stated frankly to Secretary Lane he was willing to enroll with the dollar-a-year m the government financed the project, and if financed it himself he only wanted a chance to b even. The latter plan appealed to Secretary L and it formed a part of the agreement. Thereu Mr. Campbell interested some of the big financ of the country, who, when they heard his story, w more than willing to furnish the required cap And those who know the stuff of which Mr. Ca bell is made predict that he will do much be than "break even."

Getting the Laws Enforced

By ALBERT SIDNEY GREGG

Superintendent American Civic Reform Union

BILLS are pending in the legislatures of Illinois, Ohio and West Virginia, providing for state police departments, similar to the state police systems in operation in Pennsylvania, New York, Michigan, Colorado and Oregon. There is strong opposition to these bills from labor leaders of the Bolsheviki type, and others, who hate any agency that is able to compel respect for the law.

Radical labor men say that the state police are the "Cossacks of America," and that such organizations are being formed for the purpose of breaking strikes.

The nature of the fight they are making against the state police system is revealed in some things that took place at the hearing before the Ohio senate on the Davis State Police Bill. Labor leaders from Ohio and Pennsylvania were present in battle array, and the galleries were packed with delegates from labor unions all over Ohio. The "grandstanding" by the labor orators was greeted with storms of applause, while the speeches of those who favored the bill met with little or no response. At least four of the labor leaders declared that "if capital did not stop screwing the lid down on labor the people would get all the Bolsheviki they wanted."

When one of the speakers for the bill declared that state police would be able to stop lynchings, somebody hissed. Instantly a member of the committee sprang up and demanded that such conduct be stopped at once or that the hearing be closed. The chairman of the committee declared that there would be no more hissing, and directed the sergeant-at-arms to enforce the order.

But what did the labor leaders do! They denied emphatically that any of their men had done the hissing, and charged that men had been "planted" in the hall for the purpose of disturbing the hearing and bringing discredit on organized labor!

This incident is typical of the feeling that exists everywhere.

With uneasiness in the industries, and nation-wide prohibition approaching, the matter of stronger police protection is of the gravest importance. The pending state police bills should be passed at once, and the same system established all over the United States.

WHY do labor leaders and others who wink at violence so bitterly oppose the state police system?

Because the state police know how to deal with lawbreakers. Their effectiveness is due to two factors—the system, and the character of the men employed. Ordinary law-enforcing machinery consists of officers who are more or less directly responsible to the people of the city or county in which they serve. In the cities the character of police service is affected by the kind of officials who have been placed in power by the voters. Political bosses, with privileges to sell, henchmen to protect, and votes to buy, exert a baleful influence in most of our American cities. Out in the country the sheriff is elected, and he in turn appoints his deputies. All are more or less mixed up in county politics with other county officials, eager to curry favor with men who can swing votes, regardless of moral considerations or violations of the law. Very few village or town marshals are willing to bear down hard in compelling an enforcement of the laws, especially the laws against drink, gambling and immorality.

Note that the weakness in the whole system is that the officials employed to enforce the laws are too close to the people, and are at the mercy of politicians or men who wish to win a following among the voters at large.

Over against this system let us set the state police plan, in which the authority is centered in a state superintendent, selected by the governor, who appoints the men and manages the force.

In Pennsylvania, where the state police first came into existence in the United States, there are 330 men divided into four troops, stationed as follows: Troop "A," Greensburg; Troop "B," Wyoming; Troop "C," Pittsfield; Troop "D," Butler. This arrangement places two troops in the western part of the state and two in the eastern. In order to afford the best possible protection to communities distant from the barracks, sixty-seven substations have been established in as many counties in the state. A substation is manned by three or four men. Each day mounted patrols ride out each way from the substation until they meet the patrols from the adjoining stations, and then they return. One man remains at the station to take care of phone calls and direct the movements of the men.

The substations are in direct communication with the barracks, and the barracks with the state headquarters at Harrisburg. An order can be quickly transmitted to the stations and thence to the men, who make frequent telephone reports as to where they are and what they are doing.

If any person anywhere in the state wants the state police, all he has to do is to call for "state police" the nearest telephone, without giving a number. C nection is made at once, and in a very short time nearest troopers can be notified and told just wh to go.

The advantage of this system over the old syst which limits the jurisdiction of law-enforcing offic to a certain city, town, village, or county, is appar at a glance. The state police are independent county, village, town or city boundaries.

Although most of their work is done in the count they have the power to go anywhere to catch a cri inal or enforce the law. Last winter the Federal a thorities used the state police very effectively in cl ing vice resorts in Harrisburg and later in Erie. Lo police were supine and helpless, but the state pol were strong and efficient.

AS THE troopers ride along the country roads th are ever on the alert for violations of law. T question suspicious characters, help find lost childr catch kidnappers, enforce the game and forestry la protect land from trespass, kill sheep-killing d extinguish farm and forest fires, enforce the liqu laws, and suppress illegal resorts of all kinds in lated places. Often they do excellent detective w because they can operate in many places in citize clothes and obtain evidence that local officials cann get, because they are too well known. In case o threatened outbreak troopers can be quietly conc trated, and the violence stopped before it starts.

Men on the Pennsylvania state police force h been recruited largely from men who have b trained in the army. Indeed, when the system w started twelve years ago it was comprised of men w had served in foreign wars, and who knew how ride, shoot straight and obey orders. Only men of t highest character are enlisted.

All recruits are sent to the training barracks a there put through four months of very stiff stu in criminal law and procedure, the laws of eviden the game, fish, forestry and highway laws, and t laws governing the making of arrests and the prop conduct of the state police under all circumstanc in stable hygiene and the care of horses, in marksma ship, horsemanship, and the military drill. The men are on duty all the time and can be called o night or day. It is little wonder that such men a feared by those who seek to profit by lawlessness.

The state police department is one branch of sta government, in Pennsylvania at least, that has be kept free from political interference.

The Women Who Won Prohibition

By J. A. STEWART

T WAS a beer garden in an Ohio city. Around it were gathered a group of praying women, Bibles in hands. They surrounded the place daily for days, singing hymns and praying that owner might give up his soul-destroying business, til, saying in his German fashion, "You comes so ny, I quits," he publicly pledged himself never to l intoxicants again.

This is a typical incident of the wonderful movent of nearly half a century ago, called the "Ohio usade," which swept over hill and valley from nty to county, covering a large part of the entire te and touching the borders of other states.

Among the women temperance leaders whom it ed from the trammels of stom were Mrs. Eliza J. ompson, the moving spirit the work at Hillsboro, Ohio; Mother Stewart," of Springld, Ohio, orator and organizer; rs. George Carpenter, Washgton Court House; Mrs. Hentta Marroe of Xenia; Mrs. cCabe of Cleveland; and Mrs. ary A. Woodbridge of Ranna. The last, who had been active church member for irty years and never in all that ne had prayed or spoken in blic (being averse to public pearance), became one of the ost able and gifted of women ristian temperance evangels. She was long correspondg secretary of the National oman's Christian Temperance Union, the organizan born of the crusade.

The women temperance leaders who conceived this ganization included among others Mrs. Emily Huntgton Miller, able poet and author; Mrs. Jennie wler Willing, consecrated Christian evangelist; and rs. Anne Wittenmyer, devoted army nurse (the st president of the National W. C. T. U.).

The great leader which the W. C. T. U. developed as Frances E. Willard, former dean of women at orthwestern University, a teacher of ripe experience, hom the woman's temperance movement found in hicago conducting noonday evangelistic services ith great power and success. Miss Willard became st secretary in 1874 and president in 1879. She was e great organizer of the National W. C. T. U., which e aptly termed the "sober second thought of the rusade," and which (declining other tempting offers education and in evangelism) she led with such markable power and success that she was kept at e head for nearly two-score years, until her untimely assing in 1898.

Miss Willard perfected the W. C. T. U. organizaon which for ripeness of method and fertility of bors is unparalleled. She "bewitched" women into coalition which has since won its adherents in every vilized country of the globe through the World's . C. T. U., which she founded in 1883. Hundreds f women who never thought they could or would appear in public responded to the contagious energies and winsomeness of Miss Willard.

Among the most able and efficient of her associates in W. C. T. U. leadership were Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt of Boston, the first World's W. C. T. U. "round the world" missionary; Mrs. Mary T. Lathrop of Michigan, the "Daniel Webster" of the Temperance Reform; Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens of Portland, Maine (Miss Willard's chosen successor as president of the W. C. T. U.); and Anna A. Gordon of Boston (for twenty years Miss Willard's private secretary), now president of the National W. C. T. U., succeeding Mrs. Stevens at the latter's death in 1914.

It was Mrs. Stevens who concentrated the energies of the 200,000 W. C. T. U. women on National Constitutional Prohibition in 1911 and swung the big women's temperance combine into line with the Anti-Saloon League (a generation younger than the W. C. T. U.) for national constitutional prohibition.

Legislative work was one of the first efforts of the W. C. T. U. under Miss Willard, who herself appeared long ago before the committees of the United States Congress, to which the Blair National Prohibition Bill had been referred, eloquently urging them to vote "to protect the vested interests of the mothers of America rather than the vested interests of the brewers and distillers."

Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis, a veteran New Jersey White Ribboner, has ably served for twenty years as National W. C. T. U. Superintendent of Legislation at the national capital, securing cooperation of the unions in all the states for the Federal Amendment, and also for other reform measures. In her ability and devotion she is a type of hundreds of White Ribbon leaders in this country.

Temperance education had a splendid leader in Mrs. Mary H. Hunt of Boston, whose constructive work is best demonstrated in the great body of enlightened temperance sentiment which has made Prohibition possible. Mrs. Hunt, with Miss Lucia Kimball and other coadjutors, provided textbooks and secured laws for scientific temperance education in the public schools in all the states and territories.

Another towering womanly figure in the securing of Prohibition is Mrs. Clara Hoffman of Missouri, whose convincing eloquence made many a convert to prohibition principles. Beside her stands the able Mrs. Mary T. Burt, long a leader in the Empire State, the first assistant recording secretary of the W. C. T. U. Her successor as president of the organization in New York State is Mrs. Ella A. Boole, a lifelong worker for Prohibition, and now vice-president-at-large of the National W. C. T. U. New York State provided other notable workers in Madam Demorest, of the popular Demorest Medal Contest, which has been inconceivably fruitful of good results in promoting Prohibition; and Mrs. Martha Allen, long a leader in the great work of medical temperance and the abolition of alcoholic and other deadly drugs.

The first thing Frances Willard did over forty years ago was to raise the noble women of the South, chief among whom rose leaders like Mrs. L. Meriwether of Tennessee; Mrs. Sallie Chapin of South Carolina; Mrs. Beauchamp of Kentucky; Mrs. Frances Parks, West Virginia; Mrs. Howard Hoge, Virginia; and Mrs. Mary Harris Armour of Georgia, whose splendid energies and eloquence brought the great Southern states into the dry column and helped give the Nation the Solid South for Prohibition. The great Northwest and the Southwest and the Pacific Coast have also had their corps of able women temperance leaders.

The women who have won Prohibition are a great host throughout the land. The church temperance societies; the temperance committees of the women's home missionary societies enroll thousands of them. Throughout the long years, they have been at work daring ridicule and unpopularity for the cause of righteousness and human betterment.

The Old G. A. R. and the New

WITH the return of our troops from France many plans are being discussed for forming a permanent organization of veterans similar to the Grand Army of the Repubic. The activity recalls an almost forgotten chapter n American history following the Civil War. The Jnion soldiers seemed to have recognized the value f such associations earlier in their war than have the nen in France. Little or nothing has been heard of his movement today until the signing of the armisice of the conflict, but the Union soldiers had made xcellent progress along these lines long before the Civil War had come to an end.

It is surprising to find that the first society of the kind formed of Union soldiers was organized on March 6, 1862, or before the Civil War was half over. It was composed of members of the Third Army Corps, and a year later General Daniel E. Sickles was assigned to its command. The second society was organized in the senate chamber of the state capital at Raleigh, North Carolina, on April 14, 1865. Its members were at first limited to officers who had served with the "old army of Tennessee." Other similar societies were soon formed throughout the Union army.

MANY of these early organizations in the Civil War were intended to arrange for the burial of the dead and to notify their families. In the recent war such matters have been cared for by the government, so that this incentive to form societies has been lacking. One of the principal motives back of these societies, however, was to keep alive through life the spirit of good comradeship engendered by the camp life. Most of the regiments, on the Northern side at least, sooner or later formed some such society, and arranged for future meetings. In the words of the charter of one of these societies, they planned "to keep alive and preserve that kindly, cordial feeling which has been one of the characteristics of the army during its career in the service."

At the close of the Civil War the numerous societies of veterans were quickly organized into national groups. As early as September 25, 1866, a large gathering of representatives of these societies met at Pittsburg, when General Jacob D. Cox was chosen president. The organization was soon a center of discussion, which is not to be anticipated at the present day. Excitement ran high among the friends and critics of the societies and years passed before these animosities were forgotten.

Both political parties were at the time courting the societies of veterans, or in other words were after the soldier vote. All classes and parties were exceedingly active in the political campaigns which followed. Meanwhile hundreds of societies were formed among the veterans, named "The Boys in Blue," "The Conservative Army and Navy Union," "The Colored Soldiers' League," etc. The great mass of the soldiers were Republicans, although there were many Democrats. Both parties were represented in the National Convention of Soldiers and Sailors which met in 1866. An attempt was made to organize all veterans' societies into a national body for the presidential campaign of 1868, to be known as the "National Organization of the Boys in Blue." The excitement soon spread throughout the country.

The societies and their friends urged that since the soldiers had given up their chances of advancement in business at home to enter the army, they should receive consideration in the distribution of offices and pensions. Many of the societies candidly announced their intention of looking out for these interests. Many people, on the other hand, thought that the veterans were encroaching on the political domain, in which they did not belong. It was boasted on one hand that the "American volunteer army, though disbanded, is yet a unit."

Great confusion followed. The posts of the Grand Army did not openly attend the political meetings, but the Boys in Blue societies of the same neighborhoods were often very active. In some cases both organizations would be officered by the same men, and the attendants of political meetings often wore army caps and badges. Some posts went so far as directly to present names of their officers and threatened that if they were not elected they would go over to the other side. Internal disputes followed. These conditions were only local, but the entire body of veterans were blamed. The public distrust of some of these political methods became so strong that it became difficult for new societies to be formed and some of the older societies surrendered their charters without formality.

In 1868 the National Encampment declared formally that "this association does not design to make nominations for office or use its influence as a secret society for partisan purposes." In the following year this attitude was made even more definite, when it was announced that "no discussion of partisan questions will be permitted at any meeting or any nomination for political office be made."

The New Japan—Pagan or Christian

By SHERWOOD EDDY, Secretary for Asia of the International Y. M. C. A.

WE ARE on a journey round the world, holding meetings for students in China, India and other lands. Our visit to Japan convinced us that the war has not been fought in vain so far as that country is concerned. Japan has seen that autocratic militarism is doomed and that democracy has won the day. If the menace of Prussian militarism has passed, the problem of the Pacific will probably be the greatest question before America in the next few decades.

The standard of living is rising constantly in the East, and the commerce of these countries is rapidly increasing. The trade of Japan increased nearly seventyfold in the last fifty years, from a paltry thirteen million dollars when she entered the modern world, in 1868, to over a billion dollars in 1918. If the trade of China should increase in the same proportion during the next fifty years, she would require twenty-five billions annually in imports, or ten times the amount of the total export trade of the United States at the outbreak of the war. Foreign trade, Western education and the leavening influence of Christian missions are opening up the Orient to new ways of living, creating new demands, higher ideals and rising standards.

There are three expanding races in the world today. These are the Anglo-Saxon, the Teutonic and the Japanese. What is to be the nature of the Japanese expansion? Is it to be autocratic or democratic, militaristic or peaceful, Christian or pagan? That will largely depend upon America. The war has brought a complete change of attitude in Japan toward America. The United States is no longer looked upon as a nation of money-grubbing, timid materialists, but as an efficient and powerful democracy. We found more space given to America in the Japanese press today than to any other nation; this has trebled in the last few years. Japan is watching closely to see if America lives up to her ideals, or whether the high professions of the war were mere cant and hypocrisy, to cover up a policy of materialistic selfishness and greed at home and abroad. If we are concerned with humanity, no nation is of greater moment than Japan. The first to awaken of the Oriental nations, the Japanese are today the strongest and most dominant race in all Asia, and Asia represents over half our world.

Japan is an island empire, composed of four large islands and nearly 4,000 smaller ones, raised from the ocean bed by volcanic activity. If we were to sum up the outstanding characteristics of the Japanese in a single sentence, we would say that they are intensely patriotic, practical, highly intelligent, ambitious and progressive, imitative with a capacity to adopt and adapt all that is best from other nations; they are enthusiastic, esthetic with a passionate love for the beautiful, cheerful, light-hearted, courteous and polite, and above all open-minded to new ideas. In moral character they are marked by strong loyalty, filial piety and self-control.

JAPAN has been so busy appropriating the vast complex of the outward material civilization of the West that she has not so fully received or understood the heart and soul of Christian civilization. Japan stands today at the parting of the ways, and the war has raised a crisis in her history. Two forces have been contending for the possession of Japan, like the two principles which met in conflict in the late war. On the one hand, there is the materialistic force utilizing the discoveries of Western science, organized under an autocratic militarism and inspired by the doctrine that might makes right; on the other, there is the spiritual force of Christian civilization, inspired by the conviction that right makes might, that brotherhood, humanity, altruism and Christian love are the principles that will ultimately dominate the world.

Our visit to Japan this year and to Germany before the war convinced the writer that there was a striking parallel between the past development of Japan and that of Prussia. A study of the history of both countries serves to show how much the two people had in common. In at least ten particulars they were alike. The comparison holds good up to the time America entered the war. It is our hope and belief that both Germany and Japan will learn the lesson of the war, and finally abandon the discredited policy of autocratic militarism.

Both Japan and Prussia represented expanding and dominant races, organized under a strong militarism based upon a practical materialism. Both had the same feudal foundation. In both countries there was an almost absolute power of the throne. Both nations were based on autocracy and had an inherent dread of democracy and socialism. They stood together for the autocratic control of education. Each believed in the autocratic control of the press. Japan, like Prussia, had had a remarkable expansion in trade and commerce, subsidized by the state. Both governments adopted a paternal attitude toward their people. Both stood for a militaristic colonial rule. Each nation had an elaborate and efficient intelligence department. Japan and Germany thus had a natural bond of sympathy. Each was a military oligarchy administered by a bureaucracy in the name of a divine autocracy.

WILL Japan, as the leader of the East, in unselfish altruism enter into the brotherhood of man? The writer believes implicitly in the Japanese people. Like the German people they will repudiate a discredited militarism. Just as they adapted themselves to the modern world in 1868, in one of the greatest changes known in all history, so they will adapt themselves to the present world-movement for democracy. Their leaders will not be as slow to learn as the proud Prussian Junkers, nor will they make the same fatal mistake. We believe in the Japanese, because we believe in humanity and humanity's God. We admire their great past, we sympathize with their present difficulties, we believe in their greater future that is yet to be.

The issue of the war will change the history of this nation. During our recent visit to Japan, as we interviewed her leaders and scanned her press, we became impressed with the fact that they had not failed to learn the lesson of the war. They have seen the futility and failure of an autocratic militarism based upon material science. Militarism has produced Bolshevism. Repression has given place to reaction. Democracy has won the day and holds the fate of the future. There are many signs of the steady advance of democracy in Japan. Never before have the press and platform enjoyed such freedom. A score of her leaders stand forth as fearless critics, boldly claiming the failure of Germany and the doo Japan if she follows in her footsteps. If an open of free trade, in thought and speech, in the pres on the platform, can be maintained in Japan fo next decade, it will mean the final triumph of de racy in Japan.

Two vast forces for democracy—one from wi the other from without—will be brought to bear Japan in the future. Working from within is leaven of social discontent, the irresistible voi the nation becoming clearer and more articula its demand for a government of the people, for people, by the people. From without, the world- of democracy, that have swept away the great a cratic dynasties of the Hohenzollerns, Hapsb and Romanoffs, leave Japan as the last world-p under an autocratic and military rule. History peats itself. Democracy is on the march. No na more than Japan will mark the signs of the times, none has proven more ready to adapt herself to changing condition of the modern world.

AMERICA stands in a position of peculiar ad tage and responsibility for helping Japan in second crisis in her modern history. All we nee to live up to our own ideals that we have repeat proclaimed in the war. If we do so, if we ourse are true to liberty, democracy, righteousness world-brotherhood in our cooperation with Ja China and Asia, the battle is won for democracy Christianity.

Her three ancient religions and the barren ma rialism of Western science all combined have fa to give Japan the great central truth and mig dynamic of life for the individual and the nation. combined have not given her what the Christ message of good news alone can impart. The uni sal and loving fatherhood of one God, the passion social justice for the poor and oppressed, which co with Christianity—this is what Japan needs, and t is what we can share with her in the great princi of brotherhood.

The number of missionaries in Japan has incre in the last fifty years from ten to 1,428, the Christi from four to 213,819; while the Christian commun of adherents is several times as large, and a lead Japanese estimates that "there are in Japan a milli persons who are fashioning their conduct accordi to the principles of Jesus Christ." The Sunday scho grew from nothing to an enrolment of 156,245. Fi years ago there was no Japanese Bible available; day its circulation runs into the millions. There w then hardly an asylum or hospital in the land. Chr tianity has been the pioneer in establishing homes, h pitals, refuges for the poor, the blind, the fatherle the insane, the leper, the outcast and the crimin As Count Okuma says, "The indirect influence Christianity has poured into every realm of Japane life."

Nothing but the truth will finally triumph in Japa and she will become ultimately a Christian countr as surely as our own. Japan will yet share in the e lightenment and evangelization of Asia, and will h her full part in the Kingdom of God. Because of h very strength, we must now share with her our o priceless Gift. For Japan is the rudder of Asia.

Thirty Years of Epworth League

TO DEVELOP a world-winning church by winning, saving and training the young people for Jesus Christ is the great objective of the active Epworth League of the Methodist Church, which on May 15, 1919, celebrates its thirtieth anniversary.

The event heralds the renewal of the Epworth League's pledge to world evangelization, which has been the keynote of the League for three decades. A great drive for Christian conquest is inaugurated, including also personal evangelism, which is continuously impressed as the vital duty and opportunity of every Epworthian.

The training of young leaders for Christian service is one of the best movements which the Epworth League has developed during its thirty years. This has been chiefly accomplished through Epworth League summer institutes, held in many localities scattered between the coasts. Trained specialists conduct these practical clinics in social service; thousands of young people attend, and many hundreds have dedicated themselves to the mission fields, the deaconess work, or other forms of community service.

It has been the ambition of the Epworth League ever since its organization in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1889 (by the union of five Methodist young people's groups), to serve as the training school of the Church. Classes have been constantly carried on in Bible study, Christian stewardship, social service, temperance reform, and personal evangelism. The "Morning Watch" has stimulated spiritual growth; the "Fellow Workers' Covenant" has enrolled thousands in the endeavor "to bring at least five persons to Christ within one year." The Junior League has served as a training school for the Senior League, with its simple courses in church history, government, doctrines, benevolences, and its wise plans for a graded outline of social life and activities for boys and girls; and for a graded course of study, bringing the Bible in touch with the everyday life of children just at the point of interest of the different ages. The Junior League takes the children at the age when they are most inclined to lose interest in Sunday school, holds and stimulates their interest in the church and its activities, and helps them to approach maturity with a real understanding of spiritual values, a broad foundation for active Christian service.

Rev. Wilbur F. Sheridan, General Secretary, Epworth League

It is an inspiring fact th the varied work of the Epwor League has been constantly e panding and proving its grea value as a factor in the Chri tian growth of the colored you people of the Methodist confe ences of the South (where some o its best developments are seen i the Freedmen's Aid schools a colleges and increased efforts a planned), and in the Philippine The League's thirtieth anniver sary happily heralds the furth extension of its foreign missio ary service, which has notabl been conducted in India (where salaried secretary has been su ported, and Christian literatu has been translated and pub lished in ten principal language bringing systematic Christia culture for young people withi the reach of 200,000,000), and i Mexico (where the first evangeli cal literature for boys and girls i Spanish has been provided by th League and its able secretary).

f you doubt this, there is one n who can quickly put your nion to rights. There are ny of them, in fact, but Lieu- ant-Colonel James Bordley, ector of the Red Cross In- ute for the Blind, will con- ce you in just a few crisp, inly spoken words. I found n at the Institute's head- rters, a magnificent stone idence converted into offices l rest rooms, and located in center of velvety lawns ver-bordered, shaded by giant s, at General Hospital No. It's at Guilford, just out- of Baltimore, Maryland. ere Lieutenant-Colonel Bord- represents the American Red oss, and there are located the ildings of the Military Train- School operated directly by army. Soldiers and sailors e walking about the grounds, smoking, chatting d laughing. Here and there on a stone bench sat a with a boy in khaki or navy blue. The environ- nt was one of peace and rest.

BUT the men walking about or sitting under the trees were blind men from "over there." There s no charity, no tears here. It was business dur- g business hours and play after that. The men were being re-equipped to take their places alongside their brothers in every walk of life, many of them to pick up the old thread where they had left it.

Lieutenant-Colonel Bordley talked with me; I used my eyes. When I came away a blind man could not fill me with pity unless he were one so unfortunate as not to have had the advantages which these boys of ours will have from the moment they land in America from duty overseas.

Officially put, the purpose of the Red Cross Institute for the Blind is to supply the necessary economic and social supervision of blinded marines, sailors and soldiers, after their discharge from military service. It was organized at the request of the Surgeon-General of the Army to supplement the training to be given at the Military Training School for the Blind.

Carpentering by touch, more certain perhaps than by sight

The Institute will work in conjunction with the Surgeon-General of the Army and Navy, and is, therefore, a national activity of the American Red Cross.

A returned blinded soldier or sailor is not discharged from the Army or Navy until he has completed his course of training at this school.

This training begins as soon as a sailor, soldier or marine who has lost his sight returns. His past life is studied in order to learn his previous occupation, his stability as a workman, his former wages, his moral career, his social environment both before and after his entrance into the Army or the Navy and that to which he must return, his military or naval record, and the occupational possibilities of his home community. As he passes through the Military Training School his progress and characteristics will be noted. When a soldier or sailor has been fitted to go back to civil life he will be helped to establish himself in his new field of endeavor.

ACCORDING to the possible line of work for which a blinded man may be trained, these courses are being opened in the Training School. A man may have been studying law before enlistment and now wants to fit himself for law practice. The loss of his sight will not keep him from achieving this ambition.

First he is taught Braille, the system of reading by touch. When he has mastered this he will be given books on law for study. Or he may have had a natural leaning for applied mechanics; the machine shops will give him the special training he needs.

A blind man can be taught to assemble the most delicate parts of an automobile; he can learn to make magnetos. He can be trained for cabinetmaking, for typewriting, for specialized farming operations. There are few professions or trades closed to the blind who receive the scrupulous individual training at the Training School, and later receive as careful observation by the American Red Cross through its Institute for the Blind.

"One of the most potent factors in the failure of many blind men," stated Lieutenant-Colonel Bordley, "is the lack of appreciation of their difficulties and mistaken sympathy on the part of their families. It is essential to provide against this obstacle to future success. The Red Cross Institute for the Blind is, therefore, preparing to open a cottage for the relatives of the blind in Baltimore. Toward the end of the course of instruction if there is any member of the family of the soldier or sailor, such as wife, child, or other relative, who can be of assistance to him in carrying on his future trade or profession, she will be invited to come to the Institute cottage, if necessary, without any expense to herself, and given practical instruction in how best to assist the blind man, not only in the details of the man's trade or profession, but in the best ways of assisting a blind man at home.

"Where a blind man is married and is unable himself, through serious disability, his wife will be taught some vocation from which she can add to the family income. The effort will be made to assist the family where the man was formerly a salesman, storekeeper, and the like, and must work only at home, but presumably can command the trade of a fair proportion of his old customers."

The Institute will, through a fair arrangement, help a man on leaving to provide himself with the tools of his trade.

ONE THOUSAND POODS

By GEORGE GILBERT

Author of "King of the Shillibers," "Too Much Elnathan," "A Prophet Not Without Honor," etc.

"BUT we can send elsewhere for food," old Poitr suggested.

"Yes, yes!" several said, as if that were a highly original idea, as it was, for them.

"No."

"Why not?"

"The night before the snow came a cousin of Annovna, my housekeeper, came to our place, from Lower Brinsk. He reports that at every crossroads are machine guns, and each district is going to care for itself this winter. . . . There will be no food traded or sold. It is each mir for itself."

"Then?"

"We must do the same for ourselves, my friends."

Heads no longer wagged. Many were bowed, and lips that had said few prayers since the revolution began were seen to move devoutly.

"What would you suggest, worship?" So Poitr, timidly. It was the first time the title of respect due an official had been spoken in Brinsk since the revolution had overset things. Ossip sniffed the title as if it were a savory morsel, not for the title itself, but because its bestowal meant that they were sane again.

"We must do as we can, as good Russians," he said modestly. "Come, friends. Apart we shall starve. Make me your leader for the winter. Let all come to my place. Unlike you, I have not let my straw rot. I have some wheat, not much, for I do not farm much. But I have fine, warm barns. Then there are the trees about my house. They will keep the house warm. We can be indoors in the daytime, all warm, and sleep in the straw, warmly wrapped, at night. We shall burn wood, share all alike on my food and what you bring. With discipline, we may come through to another springtime."

He began to give reasons, statistics. He made their unkempt heads reel with figures of poods, versts, pounds, ounces. They understood little of it all except that this man, so precise, so calm, so cool, had a plan. None of them had any, never had had any; all of them were accustomed to have some one plan for them. In the end they cheered old Ossip and streamed back to their houses. Within an hour they began to flounder through the snow toward the Lutheran's house. Some carried blankets, some food. Those who had crow-bait nags drove them. Early twilight found them hived in Ossip's place. Once there the precise old man closed down on them like a steel trap. His own dozen servants he always kept under firm military discipline, under sub-command of Alexis Dunkowsky, his own body-servant, himself a Lutheran, intelligent, forceful, mentally awake.

With his own people as the nucleus, Ossip organized the most active of the peasant refugees. He appealed to the abiding common sense of the old women of the group. He knew the power of his statistics to astound them all and took delight in flinging them at the heads of his enforced guests by the column, pageful. He made their heads buzz and ring with them—enlarging upon such examples as how many poods of food it would take to feed fifty people for six months.

Keeping their heads buzzing so, he yet made them cheerful. He set the ration the first day, with exactitude. The nearest of the trees about the house he had felled by some sturdy old fellows. He set others to threshing, with flails, what little wheat he had left. The women he ordered to knit, using his own wool.

Ossip did not try to proselyte. He knew that it was not time. The immediate need was for food, warmth, orderly effort, the defeat of Generals January and February. He simply opposed his own Lutheran alertness, his mental serenity, his good sense inherited from his Swedish grandmother, to their intense conservatism, mental sloth and Orthodox-nurtured ignorance.

A fever of energy seized Ossip. There were no crop figures to report or gather. As when he was a sergeant, he had people to order about. He divided them into watches. He shoved laggards about, commended willing ones. The big cellars, where the food was, he placed under the charge of Dunkowsky, who guarded the doorway, pistol in hand, or slept before it at night on a pallet of straw. Ossip himself doled out the food. He multiplied himself, went without sleep, food. But he drove the people forward. And he found time to sing cheerful hymn-tunes, to pray after his unorthodox manner, but without interfering with the prayers of his neighbors.

He found the people watching him more and more at his devotions, but he did not let them see that he thought this unusual. He refused to let them become downcast. As the days passed he grew thinner and thinner. His beard, that he wore short, was white; his great brown eyes deeply sunken.

"How is it you are able to do so much for us when we have not been good neighbors to you?" old Poitr asked him one day, as they all were eating the last of their winter radishes—without salt.

"I am trying to serve the friends the Lord has sent into my house," Ossip said. "When one does that, the rest comes easy. But now that you have spoken of holy things, I must speak of something that has been on my heart a long time. Why should you not hold what services you can here? Gregorevitch was an altar-boy, and must remember some of the old chants. You older people have kept the memory of former days better than the younger, so you must have some of the olden songs ready to sing."

Thus urged, Gregorevitch sang for them in his heavy, booming bass after the ancient mode. They made responses at set times and felt elated with it all and strengthened to go on.

The sun dipped low. Great snows piled up. Mother Volga was snowed under, her ice blanketed in white drifts; drifts on land mounted.

They managed to celebrate Christmas after a fashion. Ossip had managed to save some currants and made for them a cake, eked out with ground birch bark added to the flour for flavoring, and the last of their sugar and eggs. For tea they now had dried birch leaves and bark. Midwinter found their pickled meat gone, leaving them a little bread, a few roots. And spring might not come for weeks!

They did not hear from the outer world. Their only visitors were crows, and these they shot, when possible, to put into soup. A crow in a brass cauldron of soup is not much, but better than nothing. They placed traps and caught rats in barns and cellars; they hunted the mice out of the empty granary. And so the time lagged by, on leaden feet.

Yet, despite the shortage of food, they keep well, cheerful. Ossip had the mastery of them. Amid the many with no plan, he had a plan. And, truth to tell, after so long a spell of freedom from orders and obedience, the people found it comforting to be ordered about, to obey. The old harness of routine fell on them. They knew Ossip was just, they were afraid of his statistics. He mystified them by spouting columns of figures at them, proving, out of hand, that unless Russia did better than Brinsk had done that year, Russia would be famine-skinned, as a hide-dealer fleshes a new skin from a fat calf. Every time he did that the men would scratch their heads, the women nod their heads.

It was crowded in the house by day; snores shook the barns by night. The snows climbed higher and higher about the house and barns. There were tunnels under the snows here and there to the outhouses, and the people, under Ossip's orders, exercised in these, or in the house or barns. The barns adjoined the house directly, so there was no fear of getting lost while going from one to another. Weaker ones slept in the house.

The wood lasted well, and that was a mercy, as it was endurable to sit by a warm fire, even if one were hungry, and warm water always was to be had to drink from the big brass kettles that old Annovna kept murmuring on the stoves to keep the air pure.

And so the weeks passed. What was going on abroad no one knew. To hold onto life, to live to see the sun come back, was all each of the old persons of that part of Brinsk cared for. Ahead of them were the remainder of winter, the long, laggard spring, the early summer, before they could get any return from the earth. They might get something to eat when the river opened, by traffic. But they were not sure. And in spring they might shoot birds, catch fish. But while the winter lasted they had only to cower, starve—and endure.

Fortunately the Russian peasant is tough and endures well. Else had he perished from off the face of the earth centuries ago!

Often they thought and said, over and over again:

"One thousand poods of wheat! If only we had that back!"

"If you had heeded me, you would have kept that last thousand," Old Ossip reminded them gently, "as I wanted you to. That goose Ivanovitch filled your heads with the east wind. Well, all the orators have been at it. Too little work; too much talk. Too much raising of mischief; too little raising of wheat. The Czar is gone, but does that help you? The bourgeois republic is gone, but does that put bread into your mouths? Famine is here, but the Red Guard makes money out of it. Does brotherhood of man from politics help you? No. But brotherhood of man through Christ would. If we could get all Russia together as we are together here now, something would be done aright, but no getting of all Russia together through politics, with its graft and greed, can do us any good, my friends."

Old Poitr nodded approval, others joining.

Old Ossip shifted his argument:

"I ask again if brotherhood of man, Red style, has helped you? No; you are just foolish Russians, so kind, hopeful, loyal, but melancholy. Now, listen to me: If each part of Brinsk is well planted next year, it will average so many poods of wheat, and from that thousands of loaves of bread may be made, and they will last so many days and leave so much for sale and so much for good food."

That thought cheered them. He talked like a torrent. His breath, puffing out the white hairs on his upper lip, came and went quickly. Their heads buzzed with figures. They scratched their heads, their eyes brightened.

"You have something we have not got," old Poitr said to him at last; "you have an uplift of faith that we miss."

"Oh, I have nothing that you can not have," he said, smiling benignly;
"but I hope after this winter you not look upon me as a poor R

All winter long reports of plagu big cities. Russia, the martyr nati

But Boris Sandovar, by dint

Dmitry's grand idea was this:

ıe idea promised well, for, opposite ogda, Dmitry, his men at their sta- , cut the tow-rope. The captain d; the guns were pointed—the went on upstream. Dmitry and his rades worked the huge barge ashore tied her up to the willows at the ing.

His face had taken on allor; his eyes burned like fire. He like one of the ancient Russian stics.

Ossip had brought them through to edge of the better days. But the l was desperately low; the people fully weak. It would need but the ath of contagion, brought in by he delirium-strong wanderer, to carry m off. Ossip was praying for wheat, good bread, not for food alone, but the hope it would give of a new har- t, the elixir that tides the starving l-Russian over the hardest famine l fever-years. It was while he was so ying, aloud, in the company of the ple, that old Poitr, his eyes straying of the window, saw the barges being ed up, and then saw the lone barge ng toward their landing.

'Your prayer is answered," he said, Ossip concluded; "a huge barge is at landing. It must be that food has n sent to us."

Ossip looked out the window and ok his head.

'No, my brothers," he said; "that rge was not sent to us. We must what it contains. We have some ney that has been useless to us all nter. Let me take it, and do you all, n, come with me through the old fts, to the river. We may be able to y food."

At the mention of money the people nembered the nice new bills with ich the wheat had been paid for the ar before. They produced the new, sp bills, that had been kept con- aled all during the dark months. Soon sip had them all made into a thick d, tied with string, then, backed by e men, he went down toward the nding.

Ossip went aboard the barge, being uled on deck by the big Red Guard, o smiled at him urbanely from under e peak of his great fur cap. Ossip w the barge in a moment, knew mitry, of whose secret visits to Ivan anovitch he knew more than Dmitry eamed of, for little had escaped the n old man's eyes in the past awful onths.

Ossip heard Dmitry's price, sifted the od Brinsk wheat through his fingers. s practiced eyes—so well trained in that pertained to agriculture—knew e wheat for what it was—Brinsk—at once. It was the very cargo whose going had all but spelled ruin to the whole district! Dealt about, in grafters' hands, in dishonest merchants,' it had been brought home anew!

While Dmitry talked, the Red Guards, to impress the waiting men ashore, paraded swaggeringly about the deck. As each passed, Ossip scanned his gun narrowly. Suddenly he ceased chaffering with Dmitry and said firmly:

"This is our wheat."

The big Red Guard smiled:

"It was—last year, yes."

"It shall be again. We need it. See; here is the money paid for it, all tied up in a roll. Take it."

"No; I shall order my men to fire if you do not go away. I do not want your money."

"Order them to fire, then. None of them has a cartridge. I can tell that by the way the magazine-butts of the rifles set. The springs of them are loose, not tight as they would be if cartridges were in them to make the magazines taut at their bases. See, Dmitry, you are just a goose, with a head full of theories and a heart full of hatred against something that you do not understand, but that really is your own folly and spite."

Dmitry stared at this precise man, who seemed to know everything.

"I mean to have this wheat, that was swindled from us on the pretext that it was for the Russian brotherhood of toil," Ossip said determinedly; "true, we old men may not do as well at fighting as you younger men, but we are thirty to eleven, and before you could drift far, if you beat us, the other mirs would get people here. I see many people, even now, coming, as the signal of a barge has been flying from my house for some time now. Come, sell us the wheat at a fair price—even take the old price back."

He tendered the roll of bills. Dmitry glanced ashore, and what he saw made him decide, even if the whimpering of his Red Guard comrades had not sealed his decision.

"I accept," Dmitry faltered, knowing that his grand idea had guttered out.

Old Ossip called to his people. They swarmed onto the barge to unlade their own wheat!

"Well, 'Mitry," said one of the Guards, at dusk, as the empty barge floated city-ward on Mother Volga, "all has not gone so poorly. True, we did not get a tenfold price, but you got a large bundle of new ruble-bills, and it only remains for you to divide with us. Paper money is at a big discount, but we can get something for the lot you have."

For reply he merely cast the bills into the Volga. They stared at him.

"The bills are counterfeits," he said; "a lot specially printed up to dupe country folk with. I know, for I paid them out. I did not realize what I had at first, for there were a few good bills on top. Now it is too late to go back. The river sweeps us fast, and the water is rising all the time."

"Then it only remains for us to go ashore?"

"Yes—after firing the barge."

So, as their little boat left the barge, flames sprang from the barge's empty hold to make a flare against the spring sky and startle the seried ranks of the northing waterfowl taking the aerial path over Mother Volga into breaking the rhythm of their wing-strokes.

It was not until the spring plowing was under way that the people of Brinsk heard from the Great Committee again—orders to plant more and yet more wheat, that there might be a surplus for the year to come.

"What answer shall we make?" old Ossip asked of the people, who were assembled before the vodka shop—not selling spirits now, but made into a lounging-room and reading-room. Ossip had hired the old vodka-seller Gregorevitch, to act as his own estate storekeeper.

The Great Committee's messenger waited to hear the reply.

"Answer that Brinsk will raise just enough wheat this year to feed itself, and hereafter, as well, until there is a government in Russia that serves all the people, not a class, Red, White or Black Hundred," old Poitr said.

A loud murmur of assent went up.

"I thank you, people," Ossip said, stroking his short, white beard. With better food, outdoor life, his countenance had become smooth and merry again. The people were all recovering from famine experiences, having had early greens, fish, wheat, a few eggs.

Ossip dismissed the messenger of the Reds.

"Your reply," he told the people, "proves that you have learned something in the famine-school—that order and security are needful before prosperity can come, and after we have that we can erect for ourselves a new structure of law and order."

Curiously enough, old Ossip and his friends returned the same answer that most of the other mirs did to the appeal to raise more and more wheat for the sole benefit of one class—the Red class—in Russia. Rural Russia, so long dumb, so long misrepresented, so often lied about, had spoken by using the speech of sheer, simple negation!

And the urban busybodies, finding that they were unable to legislate bread into existence, to shoot it into being, to coin it out of the ruble-presses they ran night and day, trembled. For they knew that their power was about to be shattered. They might endure for a little time, but the people would have bread—and the Reds would have none to give!

Some one in Mologda remembered after a time that Ivan Ivanovitch had not returned from his supposed trip to the big city to get wheat for Brinsk. Then a party went to the slovenly hovel. They found its roof crushed with weight of the winter's great snows, and the body of the greedy one inside. In his hand, clutched securely in the bones the ravens had plucked clean, was the bag of money for whose sake he had deliberately sold to the Great Committee the people of Brinsk into the grip of Famine. As Ivan Ivanovitch had no living relatives, the money was taken and placed in a fund for the erection of a neat Lutheran chapel next to the old vodka shop.

"For," said old Poitr, "in the new Russia we shall be free indeed—free of Czars, Reds and their prejudices and oppression. We of the old style will be Orthodox, no doubt, but when the boys and girls come back, if some of them do, we want them to have a choice, and if any of them goes in the new path, we shall not object nor permit them to be persecuted."

Old Ossip smiled and rubbed his nose. He was very happy.

Even in Korea Women Are Taking Away Men's Jobs

Korean women embroidering

MEN used to be the embroiderers in Korea, but in the last few years women have been learning the art, and the monopoly which the men have held on it for centuries has been broken up.

These girls are busily engaged in making butterflies, flowers, dragons, and other familiar emblems of Japan and Korea, on bits of satin and silk at the Methodist school for girls at Songdo.

The proceeds from the sale of this work helps pay their tuition at the school.

Korean women are fast gaining a wider world outlook.

Wanted! Some New Amusements!

By CHARLES M. SHELDON

THE human race has made some remarkable progress in the last hundred years in science, surgery, agriculture, commerce, education and transportation. But in matters of amusements it has not made one step of real progress in five hundred years.

The stereotyped amusements of civilized communities are card-playing, dancing, theater-going, receptions, parties, and social functions. Within these little circles thousands of human beings made in the image of God find all the amusements of life. They never look through a microscope or a telescope. They know nothing of flowers or biology. They are born into a wonder world, but die without knowing any of its wonders. The great things of creation never appeal to them.

Isn't it about time some one invented a new amusement? To hear the young people, some of them in our churches, talk, one would think that life would be insupportable without these trivial forms of entertainment. Parents and preachers call the amusement question a grave problem for their young people. As a matter of fact the whole round of pleasures in which thousands of people indulge is so trivial that a human being with any mentality ought to feel ashamed at the thought of spending time and money and thought over them. Even where the amusements have no immoral influence they are so childish and senseless in certain forms that it is a wonder that no one in all the course of the years has found or made a new form of entertainment that would appeal to the sense of beauty and intelligence combined.

Dancing and card-playing are accepted as the stereotyped forms of amusement because they are so easily provided, aside from anything that may be brought forward in the way of sex attraction or the element of chance. But it ought not to be impossible to create a form of amusement that would appeal to all sorts of people, an amusement that would not carry with it any question as to its being questionable.

Wanted, therefore, some new amusements! By this time, after all these centuries, human beings ought to be ashamed of doing the same childish things, things that have no power to lift the soul of man one step nearer the divine. Even a human being's amusements are in vain unless they do that. "Whatsoever we do, we should do all to the glory of God."

Isn't it about time we learned to play like rational grown-up beings? But as far as we have so far gone, we are still babies when it comes to the amusements of life.

Know Your Child

By DR. J. H. FRANCIS, of the United States Bureau of Education

NO TWO children are alike, not even twin sisters. Any effort to make them so is wicked and wasteful. Courses of study administered to all children in the same way are destructive of originality and initiative. Uniformity of treatment is deadly and deadening.

Every normal child has possibilities in some things. To help him discover and develop them is the greatest service society can render him and itself. To study about a child is not to know the individual child. Traditions, customs, preconceived notions of habit and conduct must be subordinated if not eliminated, while studying the child. Fraternize with him, associate with him, be a good fellow with him and study him. But do not let him know you are doing this.

There is no other study so fascinating, so absorbingly interesting. Study him. He will surprise you every day with what he knows and can do. Really he will teach you some things worth knowing; that is, if you are in a mood to learn.

First of all, the child is a little animal. He needs food fit to eat, clothes fit to wear and a house fit to live in. But he is also eminently spiritual, and needs spirits fit to associate with.

The child learns as naturally as he eats or grows. Thus he needs mental food. Also if he does not thrive on that found in the home or school, change his mental diet. It will do him good and may help you.

Fear is one of the most withering curses of all ages. Don't try to scare him. Cultivate his hope, faith and courage. He will need these qualities later. The fact that they are rare does not lesson their value.

An Efficiency Device

By LAURA A. KIRKMAN

"MONEY! Money! Money!" sighed the mother-of-six. "What's the use of reading the advice of housekeeping experts? In order to follow their advice one must spend so much. For instance, they say that one should sit on a high artist's stool before one's kitchen cabinet or in one's pantry; that's all right, but it represents another purchase—a stool."

There is a way of carrying out this advice, however, without expense: a discarded baby's highchair may be used for this purpose if its back and arms are removed. Efficiency experts advise the covering of artists' stools with denim to save the housekeeper's skirt from becoming shiny, and if the highchair-stool is covered in this way its origin will never be suspected.

Household Hints

WHITEWASH the floor just below the last step of a dark pair of cellar stairs to remove the danger of falling.

"Runs" will not appear in stockings which have been doubled over half an inch at the top and stitched down on the machine. This also keeps the garter clasp from slipping off.

Rough-work gloves of the heavy cotton variety will wear longer if they are worn alternately on the wrong hands, the palms being used as backs every other time; for naturally the right-hand glove gets the most wear.

Instead of throwing away hemstitched supper cloths and bureau covers when the hemstitching wears out, join the hem to the main part by working one of the simple renaissance lace stitches between them with a needle and heavy white linen thread.

Pry off the circular nickel center of your round ink-erasers after the eraser has worn down to this obstruction, and use the part which lies under the nickel plate.

In putting up the school children's lunch, remember that a ragged, soaked, or crumbly sandwich is not very tempting.

Marion Harland's Corner

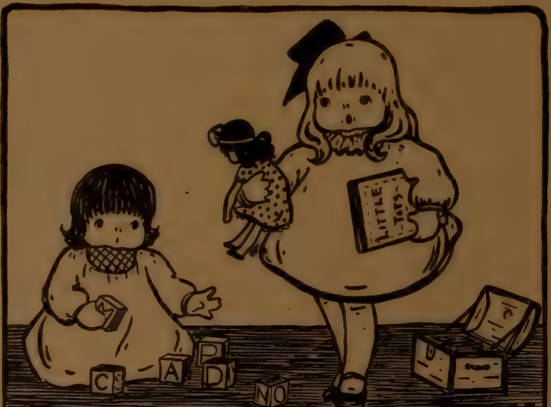
THEY had no name for it, but before a flood of cook-books was let loose upon the land, housemothers far and near made American cookery by the free exchange of recipes and bits of culinary knowledge. Every country and village neighborhood was a lively, if informal, circulating library of information upon these heads. A new and attractive recipe was caught at as eagerly as the latest French fashion in dress is now seized upon and adopted by leaders in the gay world. From judicious selections from such exchanges the first manuals of cookery were compiled and superseded the manuscript volumes cherished as heirlooms by our canny mothers. I speak with authority based upon countless letters from correspondents, in expressing my belief that no feature of the Corner has been more useful and generally acceptable than this to those we would serve. What has helped the individual housewife ceases to be private property if she believes that it will be helpful to some other woman battling with problems she would solve for the best interests of her family. "Pass it on!" should be the word for the day or hour.

A New Use for Suit Boxes

THE cardboard boxes which merchants use for delivering suits and coats are excellent for packing away winter underwear, nightgowns, etc., when there is a scarcity of chest and trunk room. The heavy underwear of each member of the family may be put in a separate box. The boxes should be labeled on the end so that a glance will tell the contents. Tie each box with a stout string so as to keep the lid on firmly, then pile them one on top of the other.

A LONG JOURNEY

By ELIZABETH FITZHUGH



OUR Church is going to pack a box
For children far away,
Who have no pretty picture books,
Or dolls, or games to play.

We're seeing what we have to send—
My book and Baby's blocks,
This dolly and her trunk of clothes
Are going in that box.

And when strange children take them out
In some far distant land,
They'll wonder where they are; it's hard
For toys to understand.

Reverence in Children

By FELIX ADLER

ONE of the defects of life is the l of reverence evinced by child be overcome?

The parent himself or herself m show reverence in order to teach it.
word of mouth, no precept, is as force

Let me illustrate. There is strik opportunity for teaching reverence the home in the case of the grandp

I am carving this bowl for thee, fath

Not only the grandparents, but aged and helpless people, should

Sin and Its Consequences

Gen. 3 : 1-13, Rom. 1 : 18-23 and Gal. 6 : 7-8

The Nature and Results of Sin

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE great problem of human life is the problem of sin and redemption. Hence the Bible begins with sentation of the fall of man which ; true to the individual experience very thoughtful soul. Like Adam ave been richly gifted and blessed. him we have had abundant warning f the danger of disobedience. Like we have felt inward shame because ur wrong-doing, while outwardly ave tried to excuse ourselves, blaming others, or circumstances, or environt. We have all felt in our hearts sense of personal accountability for lives.

aturally in the developing life of Bible, with the pioneering spirit of prophets and the apostles leading on into the Kingdom of Mansoul, e are more varied and more thoroughgoing studies of sin and penalty, uilt and forgiveness, and of sanctification. It may be worth while to note east three phases characteristic of n general. In the first place, it may vilful disobedience, a flagrant transsion of known principles of rightness and love and purity—the sin hose who know the good but follow evil. In the second place, it may be ssing the mark," where there is less ilfulness and more of blind impulse, yielding to the baser appetites in d folly, or even the moral consences of erroneous ideas of life and values. Thirdly, there is the failure se to our highest possibilities, to apiate our Heavenly Father and to in nearer to his likeness. Here e in countless "sins of omission" the world's courts have nothing o with, but which before the great rcher of hearts are grievous to the it, who sees with sorrow our inferiy to what we might have been.

lave we lost the sense of sin in our lern Christianity? The question been raised but can be quickly wered. I believe we have a keen se of sin and shortcoming in both al and individual life. It is not so rbid and self-centered as in some eras the Church when men sought the ert or the monastic cell. But it is ny mind more hopeful of the power grace of Christ. Woe to any of us has lost the sense of sin, who has ched already his ideal! What a ful figure he will make before the ite Throne of Christ! That was the uble with the Pharisee in the temple, om the Master pilloried forever in eyes of the world. To be satisfied h ourselves, to be satisfied with the sent condition of the world, is unkable. "Blessed are they that hunand thirst after righteousness." e truest saints are most conscious of ir need of the divine forgiveness.

e Results of Sin in the Individual Life

Sin is always driving men and women of Eden. It is spoiling homes, cloudlives, robbing our fellow creatures happiness and hindering their spiritgrowth. From one point of view sin ults in deformity; the sinner is not a erfect man." His "heart is hardened" the eyes of his soul are darkened. ok up John 9 and see the frightful -sidedness of the Pharisees who ld find no good in the Son of God. om another point of view the consence of sin is guilt, that dreadful tlessness of the soul that is suffering norse and plumbing the depths of happiness. Where conscience is still tioning, it sits as judge and execuer and exacts a heavy spiritual alty. Ofttimes where no earthly user ever arises, the judge within pronounced the heavier verdict on guilty soul. To satisfy that voice contribute to the government's onscience Fund," or even come forrd to the officers of the law to give themselves up, hoping that the penalties of earth will mitigate the guilt that cries to heaven.

The Scriptures speak often of the result of sin for individual and nation as "death," a word that includes the physical death of the body, but carries with it a more ominous doom still. Long ago Ezekiel reiterated, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Literal death results from sins against the body, committed often by those who know full well that excess brings ruin in its train. Social death comes to that man who shuts himself from humanity by his greed or selfishness in dealing with his fellow beings. But saddest of all, spiritual death to what is highest and most significant here, with the prospect of missing the eternal life with Christ hereafter, is the final fruit of sin.

All of these phrases are summed up in the thought of penalty, which is inevitable in a moral universe, the creation of a just and holy God. "Be sure your sin will find you out" was the statement of Moses many centuries ago, and all science and philosophy reinforce his moral judgment. "Be not deceived," said Paul; "God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Only the fool thinks he can mock God and escape the penalties of his wrongdoing. For the most part we see penalty awarded in this present life, and we cannot imagine otherwise than the same law continuing to operate in the next life as well. "For he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."

The Social Consequences of Sin

Jesus' doctrine of the divine fatherhood and human brotherhood emphasizes with renewed clearness the social possibilities of our conduct for good or for ill. These social consequences are seen clearly in two forms, heredity and influence. Sin itself has a hereditary element, the foundation of the doctrine of original sin—namely the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation. This is one of the saddest and most sobering of facts, which if duly recognized is a powerful force for temperance and self-control. While we all know that evil tendencies are inherited, we must take comfort by remembering that good tendencies are also transmitted. People sometimes forget that good, like evil, is both hereditary and contagious. It spreads from soul to soul, till the influence of one man like Oberlin transforms a countryside and changes things across the sea.

Certain it is that sin in the individual corrupts society. The "successful" bad man contaminates the youth of a whole city. Trains of bad habits are ingrained in the fiber of a community, just as the very brain cells of the individual are molded in wrong collocations by evil-doing. That is why the new realization of our social responsibility is one of the most hopeful signs of the times in which we live. We are beginning to acknowledge that we are our brother's keeper, and that no man liveth to himself. We are unconsciously classifying people by their influence rather than their wealth, their orthodoxy of doctrine, or their intellectual ability. By their social influence men are either gathering with Christ, or scattering abroad what he would fain bring together into his Father's house.

We realize the "exceeding sinfulness of sin" when we find it destroying others besides the sinner. Its social effects are its worst feature. So we understand Jesus' reason for getting men into a right attitude toward one another, as essential to a right standing before God. We can see clearly that all sin is selfish, while all righteousness takes others into account. Even Jesus said, "For their sakes I sanctify myself." We must remember this when we pass to the study of salvation by faith in Christ.

What They Are Thinking Of

THE boy in khaki had landed in his home town. He had seen six months of service; had acquitted himself honorably, and was returning without a scratch. More than this; the little home circle was still intact, for Death, which has visited so many homes in the past year, had passed his by.

"Why don't you talk?" some one asked him. "Aren't you glad to be home?" "I can't help thinking," he replied, "of the people of France and Belgium who have no homes to go to."

It is of the women of afflicted France and Russia the Young Women's Christian Association is now thinking. It has redoubled all the efforts made in time of war. It stood behind the women when they worked on munitions; there is felt to be greater need of its moral and physical support now that the men are coming to the homes that must be rebuilt for them.

Missions Lead All in Church Unity

By H. K. CARROLL, LL.D.

THE Ad Interim Committee must hurry forward its arrangements for organic union in the United States, or the missionaries and native Christians of China will come in ahead. In January of this year a Conference Union Committee, representing several denominational bodies, met in Nanking, China, and in a few days came to a unanimous agreement to unite on a basis of union and a doctrinal declaration.

While there are not so many bodies involved in this movement as in that initiated by the Presbyterian Church in this country, still they are quite as diverse in matters of polity. The churches represented are the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Churches of China, embracing American, Canadian, British and Australian Presbyterian and Reformed bodies, eight or ten in number, and the English and American Congregationalists. Problems in differences of creeds or confessions, of church organization and government, and of denominational discipline, were present, but they did not prove insuperable obstacles.

The Conference Committee on Church Union, which began and completed its work in Nanking, January 10-13, 1919, consisted of eighteen members, of whom nine were appointed by the Presbyterian churches, four by the London Mission churches, and five by the American Board churches. Four of the Presbyterian Committee were Chinese ministers, two of the London Committee and two of the American Board Committee. The rest were missionaries. Chinese ministers also served on the committees on Confession of Faith, and on Organization, or Basis of Union, and one of the two vice-presidents and one of the two secretaries were Chinese.

The course of the proceedings seems to have been wonderfully smooth. Periods of prayer came frequently and must have been very helpful. Before going into the subcommittee work, there was an informal discussion on the Confession of Faith. After a few hours the doctrinal declaration was reported and at once adopted. It affirms that:

"Our bond of union consists: 1. In our faith in Jesus Christ as our Redeemer and Lord on whom the Christian Church was founded, and an earnest desire for the establishment of His Kingdom throughout the whole earth; 2. In our acceptance of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the divinely inspired Word of God and the supreme authority in matters of faith and duty; and 3. In our acknowledgment of the Apostles' Creed as expressing the fundamental doctrines of our common Evangelical faith, which faith has been the heritage and strength of the Christian Church through all its history."

This simple but strong declaration is followed by the statement that the church to be established, being autonomous, will have the prerogative of formulating its own doctrinal symbol, and that until this is done each section will adhere to its own creed.

The plan of union apparently met the same hearty acceptance. As adopted, it provides that the name of the new organization shall be "The United Church of Christ in China," and declares the object of the Union to be the binding "of the churches together in one body, with a view to developing a self-supporting, self-governing and self-propagating Chinese Church, which shall present a united living testimony to Christ and worthily represent to the world the Christian ideals."

The basis further provides for district associations, or presbyteries, divisional councils, or synods, and a general Assembly to be composed of delegates nominated by the district associations and elected by the divisional councils. Its powers cover all matters relating to constitution and confession of faith and records of the subordinate judicatories; and it is to represent the church in dealings with other churches, decide upon the qualifications of ministers, repress schismatical tendencies, etc. In short, its model is evidently that of the Presbyterian General Assembly, as known in the United States.

Those accustomed to the Congregational system, in which each local church is self-governing, have yielded something in preparing for the Union, though the congregational idea appears in the district associations which parallel the presbyteries.

The plan is, of course, of temporary character, leaving it to the United Church to make its own constitution. It is interesting to observe that provision is made for other bodies which may desire to enter the Union. There is a very good prospect of this on the part of the English Baptist Mission and the American Mission of Friends, both of which were represented at the sessions of the Union Conference Committee. The mission of the English United Methodist Church is also interes the project.

Bishop Weekley's Views on Church Unity

THE question of Church Union is now at the front again, and is being seriously considered in every quarter. It is, and always has been, a popular subject, because it appeals to the larger ideals and hopes of the seriously minded of every communion. While we are to avoid pessimism on one hand, we must curb our optimism on the other. Let us not forget that men honestly differ in judgment and methods, and even in their intrepretation of the Word. Paul and Barnabas could not harmonize on a missionary policy, and separated, never to work together again. Peter and Paul had a warm discussion over the observance of certain customs, wherein the former was openly charged with inconsistencies. The church at Corinth was once all torn up because of their prejudices and preferences—so much so that Paul felt called upon to rebuke them sharply. Yes, men differ in matters of judgment. It always has been so, and will so remain, most likely, until the coming of our Lord. We must deal with facts, rather than with glittering fancies.

I think it a waste of time to discuss absolute organic oneness. To attain such an ideal we would have to eradicate from millions—many of them devout Christians—the training of a lifetime and completely revamp the theories and policies to which they are so thoroughly accustomed and committed. Can this be done? Should we try to do it and run the risk of what might follow? In our zeal for union should we press the matter up to the breaking point?

It is clear to me that family groups should get together. For example, why should the many churches bearing the name "Methodist" remain apart? Does Methodism have more than one Gospel message? Certainly not. These bodies all hold to Wesley as their founder on the human side. They cling to the same fundamentals in doctrine, differing only in certain phases of governmental polity. Precisely so with the Presbyterian, Baptist, and Lutheran families. One church of each name is enough. What a saving of men and money such a policy would insure! It is a sin to waste sacred funds, and to render almost useless the lives of really great and good men by putting them where they are hopelessly handicapped by ecclesiastical limitations.

Until something better can be done, why should not churches similar in faith and methods begin at once to retrench by uniting in general work? I mean this: Why should a dozen similar churches maintain as many publishing houses, when a half-dozen would suffice? Why pay a score of Sunday school editors, when three or four could do the work? For, be it remembered, in family groups the lesson comments practically the same. Why suppo

"A bar to manliness and wealth,
A door to want and broken health;
A bar to hope, a bar to prayer,
A door to darkness and despair;
A bar to joy that home imparts,
A door to tears and breaking hearts;
A bar to heaven, a door to hell—
Whoever named it named it well."

ader, Columbus, Ohio. Volney, a cele- d philosophical writer, who died nearly a ry ago, wrote in 1791 a prediction of a e of Nations, which would "come to in a new-born age," and would be a er to the peoples of the world, "a terror rants, and a hope to the human race." 40, William Ladd, an American pacifist uthor, wrote an essay on a "Congress of ns for the Adjustment of International ites Without Resort to Arms." The ress he pictured, however, was not to be rned with wars and revolutions, or with of government, but wholly with the ourse of nations in peace and war. A Court of Nations, the creation of the Congress, was to settle disputes according to a code of international relations.

Mrs. J. H. J., Homer, Ill. It is certainly right and proper for any member of the family to offer grace before the meal. It is the proper office of the father, but if, because of lack of faith or lack of courage, or for any other reason, the father does not wish to take it up, the wife is entirely within her rights in giving proper leadership to the religious atmosphere of the home by asking a blessing herself. We know of a family in which this custom is observed by the wife, the husband bowing his head reverently, even though he is not an acknowledged Christian.

Miss E. S., Gotham, Wis. 1. The regulations concerning trade with enemy countries will probably be one of the subjects taken up by the Peace Congress. 2. A Ladies' Aid Society ought to find better topics of conversation at the meetings than mere gossip. The newspapers are great educators, but judgment must be used in selecting suitable themes for discussion, avoiding scandal and gossip. World philanthropy, Church Unity, reconstruction and the like are subjects concerning which views could be beneficially exchanged. Church organizations have linked up with these big movements and done very effective service.

R. B. F., Ottumwa, Iowa. As far as the correspondents in the daily newspapers are concerned, there has been no definite allusion to religious services of any kind in the Peace Conference, although there may have been prayers at the opening of some of the meetings.

Anxious Parent, Damascus, Ohio. There are many clergymen who, on conscientious grounds, will not perform the marriage ceremony between persons who have been divorced. The laws regarding divorce and the marriage of divorced persons vary in different States.

W. S. G., Jamestown, Ohio. It frequently happens that a few earnest, zealous Christian men and women infuse new life into an entire congregation. There is nothing that kindles the flame of service like contact with those who are actually engaged in it. To benefit by any ministry, one must have the hearing ear, the open mind, the willing heart and the desire to acquire knowledge of the spiritual life. Unfortunately, there are many who attend services without this equipment, and they blame the preacher when the fault is really in themselves. Such folks should try to come into closer relations, and then they might think differently. We speak from experience when we say that there is nothing like "laying hold" to cure indifference, and to add new zest to life and a new meaning and force to the work of the church.

A Subscriber. The Land of Nod to which Cain was banished after the murder of Abel, and where he found his wife, means simply "land of exile." We may gather from Gen. 4 : 14-15, that at the time referred to the human family had multiplied considerably. Cain's wife was doubtless some blood relative, probably a sister. An ancient Arab tradition states that her name was Azura. From the account in Genesis we may conjecture that although only four persons are mentioned in the sacred narrative up to that point, the human race had increased rapidly (Josephus says that the Jews held a tradition that Adam had thirty-three sons and twenty-three daughters). Cain's fear of punishment may therefore have been directed toward his own relatives.

J. H. W., Wilkie, Okla. The passage in Gen. 49 : 10 has always been regarded by Christians, and by the Jews themselves, as indicating the Messiah. The Targum renders the passage thus: "One having the principality shall not be taken from the house of Judah nor scribe from his children's children until the Messiah come whose the Kingdom is." Still another version from the same source is: "Kings shall not fail from the house of Judah nor skillful doctors of the law from his children's children until the time when the King's Messiah shall come." The allusion to Judah is interpreted to refer to the primacy of that tribe in war, which was to continue until the promised land was conquered and the ark of the covenant deposited at Shiloh. Some of the ablest expositors point out that the descent of our Lord from Judah is not conveyed in the words "from between his feet," hence the question of lineage is not involved.

H. E. M. The origin of the title "Reverend," as applied to ministers, is obscure. It is known to have been in use as early as the thirteenth century. The Puritans applied it, and Richard Baxter addressed his colaborers in the ministry as "Reverend Brethren." In the early church the ministers were designated as "leaders." The title "reverend" which came into use later referred to the character of the office, rather than to the individual. It dignifies the work rather than the worker.

Young People's Topics for May 11

The Lure of the World

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. II Tim. 4:10; I John 2:15–17

"THE world" as it is used in this topic means selfish pleasure or selfish personal indulgence or personal ease, all of which frequently attract Christians from the path of active service. The trouble is usually that self is bulked larger in the vision than service. There are many pleasures that may be enjoyed by the young Christian which are also common to those who are not Christians. Music, rhythm, open-air sport, tramping, study of the life of field and wood, all of these properly fit into the Christian life, provided we live for the good we can do. Each of these is capable of drawing us away from Christ if we care to live solely for self. Adam and Eve were tempted away from spiritual duty by apparent material gain. They were promised power, knowledge, and the ability to be like God. They accepted the promise and suffered the penalty of their mistake. The devil in tempting Christ promised to give him all the kingdoms of the world and all their possessions in return for one moment's worship. Jesus repelled the temptation, and today his spirit rules in the councils of men, and his followers hold for his service a large part of the possessions of the world. Selfish pleasure endures for an hour, but fades with the next sunrise. Unselfish service builds a structure of unfading joy which endures not only through this life, but becomes a foundation for the life beyond. Demas, who forsook Paul, having loved this present world, has many followers among present-day Christians. Demas dropped out of sight as he forsook the better way. Those who forsake Christ today frequently fall into oblivion, their lives becoming meaningless, their time spent fruitlessly in seeking new pleasures.

"The world passeth away and the lust thereof, but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever."

Henry Ward Beecher has declared that "This world is God's workshop for making men in."

Young has said:

"To know the world, not love her, is thy point;
She gives but little, nor that little long."

St. Augustine said: "Trust not the world for it never payeth what it promiseth."

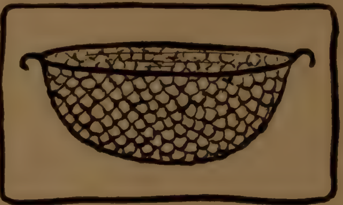
What Walter Made With Wire

By LAURA A. KIRKMAN

"I WISH I could buy a little wire basket to fit into the top of the pot in which I boil vegetables," said Walter's mother one day. "You see, if I had such a basket, I could steam one vegetable in it while I boil another vegetable in the water below; that would economize space on the top of my stove."

Walter was an ingenious boy, and he told his mother that he believed he could make her the kind of basket she wanted. This is how he went about it:



He cut a piece of fine-mesh chicken wire one inch larger all around than the surface of the pot. He then laid this wire disc over the top of the pot and pushed it down into the pot, gathering together the slack edges. These overlapped or "gathered" edges he bent over a rim which he had made from a strong piece of wire, and rolled these edges under the rim. (The rim was the exact size of the opening of the pot.) Two small pieces of wire formed a hook on either side.

Walter's mother was greatly pleased with her wire vegetable basket, and she used it continually. She discovered that it was best to put only the colorless vegetables in the steaming basket and boil the highly colored ones below, so as to avoid colored drippings into the lower part of the pot.

The Simoom in the Desert

(Cover Picture Story)

DARK on the horizon lies a growing cloud, the sun is blood red, the air hot to suffocation, the camels nervous, the traveler strangely alarmed. The Sheik suddenly commands a halt. The camels kneel, the travelers dismount, tents are hurriedly pitched, or if the storm has already come, all huddle together, men wrapped in their mantles, camels with heads in the sand, until the fury of the wind has spent itself. When the storm is gone each man and camel is the center of a mound of sand, the trail is blown away and the traveler, wondering that he is still alive often seeks relief for parched lips and burning thirst, in the cool promise ot the fickle mirage. The terror of the desert has passed. Sometimes the traveler remains the center of his mound of sand, killed and buried by a single agency, the great sand storm of the desert, the simoom.

Although distinctly a desert storm, the simoom sometimes invades the valley of the Nile, being felt even in Cairo. It also travels across the Mediterranean and the Italians call the dust-laden storm with the hot breath, sirocco.

The deserts of Arabia and the deserts and plains of America also know their sand storms, which waylay the helpless traveler, fill his lungs with hot suffocating dust and make water a priceless boon, in seeking which he often loses the trail. Sometimes the whirling storm seems made up of alternate hot and cold currents of air, so that the person caught in its toils, buffeted by the stinging sand, is alternately chilled and heated, being often nearly in a state of physical collapse when the storm is over.

of the Editorial Staff of the Christian Herald

"I am for the square deal"

DOCTOR IGLEHART is now writing for the Christian Herald (to publish in book form) his appreciation of Theodore Roosevelt, from an intimate friendship of many years. The Author cooperated with the Colonel back in the strenuous days when Colonel Roosevelt, as Police Commissioner of New York City, made the saloons obey the law on Sunday closing. For over 20 years, the two have been intimate friends. Dr. Iglehart will honor in this appreciation the memory of a great personality who has left a warm spot in the hearts of all Americans.

Dr. Iglehart is writing on Col. Theodore Roosevelt as he knew him. The Author says in his preface that he counts the intimate and personal friendship of Col. Roosevelt for the last twenty-four years as one of the highest honors, joys and blessings of his life. In this book he tells a fascinating story of the career of Col. Roosevelt

FROM EARLY BOYHOOD TO HIS DEATH

Many of the Colonel's lifelong friends have gladly furnished the Author with addresses to be included in the work on Theodore Roosevelt, among whom may be mentioned:

There Is a Place in Every Home for This Beautiful Memorial Volume

The Best Loved Man Since Lincoln

THEODORE ROOSEVELT Was The Man Who Told the World how our Great West became the Heart of Our Country. He was the man who put the fighting edge on Our American Navy. He possessed a most wonderful element of power and applied it most admirably.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was four years old when Theodore Roosevelt began his public life. The two have run parallel for thirty-seven years, incarnating the same family virtues, home-spun honesty, broad charity, faith in the Bible, activity in the Christian life, and both devoted to the public good. The author of this book emphasizes the mental, moral and religious qualities that made the hero good and great, and the unselfish devotion of his life to his country. We ask our subscribers who, irrespective of denominational creed or political affiliation, count Mr. Roosevelt as a model, to help us in the widest possible circulation of this volume by sending for a copy of the first edition. Thus our whole Christian Herald Family will be enlisted in this message of morals, patriotism and religion.

SEND NO MONEY NOW — We do not want any money now. This splendid book will be ready for delivery in a few weeks. We would, however, like to have a post card from as many Christian Herald Readers as possible stating that they will take a copy when ready at the price of $1.50 a copy, postpaid. This will give us a good idea of how many copies to make for the first edition. We will notify all who order when the edition will be ready.

Fiume and its harbor, the city of 50,000 souls which proved a bar to Peace

President Wilson on April 23 made public in Paris statement which he had prepared some days previ- sly in view of a possible impasse. This statement d been submitted to the American delegates and to emier Lloyd George and Clemenceau, and had met e approval of the Premiers and the whole American ace delegation. (For statement see next page.)

The statement, which, without doubt, will become e of the great State papers of the Conference, and hich ranks with the celebrated 14 points in its rela- n to the rights of men, stated the situation so early that it was impossible for Italy to give a con- ncing answer. It completely justified the position the President, and was looked upon in all quarters a final blow to all secret agreements involved in e war. It was considered as applying not only to the iume controversy but to the controversy between hina and Japan regarding the final disposition of iau-Chau and of the Shantung Peninsula.

Premier Orlando said to representatives of the ress: "We have withdrawn. If we go home, it will t mean a rupture of diplomatic relations, but an pression of lack of solidarity between Italy and the her members of the Conference."

Premier Orlando on April 24 issued a statement in hich he declared the President's statement a breach diplomacy and protested against the apparent in- ntion to go over the head of the Italian Government the Italian people, an act which he felt to be an im- lication that the government was not fully demo- ratic and representative. Before leaving Paris, rlando held a long conference with President Wilson nd Premiers Lloyd George and Clemenceau. The Italian members of the subordinate conference committees remained in large part in active cooperation with the Allies, and there was a feeling that the crisis would pass through some form of compromise which would satisfy all parties. One compromise suggested was the internationalizing of Fiume under the League of Nations.

On April 25 Italian throngs paraded in Rome and other Italian cities, declaring Italy's support of the claims pressed by her delegates at Paris. The temper of the people was said to be menacing toward President Wilson and Americans, and the British and French and United States Embassies were placed under military guard. A member of the Italian delegation was quoted as declaring that Parliament would meet immediately on Premier Orlando's return and that a measure would be passed declaring Fiume and Dalmatia annexed to Italy. He announced that 100,000 men would be sent into Dalmatia at once and a similar number concentrated in the region around Fiume. The latter city is garrisoned at present by a part of the Allied Army of Occupation, there being French and British, as well as Italian troops in the city, and Italy was reported to have sent four additional divisions of troops. The Jugoslavs were also reported to be planning a demonstration, and the whole situation was one of delicate balance and infinite possibilities.

Premier Orlando was received in Italy with monster demonstrations, in which his stand at Paris was upheld. Addressing a crowd in Rome, he said, "It is not a time for fine language. In the face of the world, which is judging us, we must have firmness and a calm, serene conscience." He asked if the delegates had faithfully interpreted the will of the Italian people and the crowd was reported to have answered with a thunderous affirmative. He then intimated that Italy might have to face fresh sacrifices and privations and might find herself alone, and the people replied, "We will face anything."

It seemed to be the general opinion in Paris that the Italian delegation would be back in Paris by May 2 or 3, ready to accept such a compromise as would be acceptable to the other three members of the Big Four and the nations they represent. It was suggested that Orlando might not return, but that a statesman not committed to Sonnino's annexationist policy might succeed Orlando as premier. Nitti and Bissolati, former members of Orlando's cabinet, were both mentioned in this connection.

The Allied-Italian snarl was received with considerable joy in Germany, German leaders seeing in it hope of a breach in the unity of the Entente, through which they might perhaps profit in the peace making. Opinion in the French and British Press regarding the President's statement ran all the way from complete commendation to bitter criticism. The London Daily Chronicle called brusk the "President's breach with the ordinary methods of diplomacy." The London Times backed the President strongly, declaring that Italy had no right to insist upon the carrying out of clauses in the secret treaty which were not in her favor and rejecting those in favor of the Jugoslavs. British Labor leaders on April 23 sent President Wilson a telegram congratulating him "On your magnificent declaration for peace based on the 14 points."

The first parties of the German delegation to the Peace Conference reached Versailles on April 25.

The revised covenant of the League of Nations was adopted unanimously by the Conference on April 28.

Is Bolshevism Nearing Collapse?

ON APRIL 21, 22 and 23 various dispatches, some a trifle circumstantial, but all in agreement, indicated that the Russian Bolshevist armies were being defeated on all fronts and were disintegrating. The Bolshevist First Army captured by the Ukrainians was reported to have reversed its allegiance and to be fighting with the Ukrainians. On April 22 smashing blows by the Polish Army recaptured Vilna, and a considerable area surrounding the city. This capture was reported from Warsaw and admitted at Moscow. The Lettish and Esthonian troops were also exerting pressure on the Bolshevist armies.

On April 23 the Siberian armies of Adm. Kolchak were pressing the Bolshevists hard. They had reached to within 100 miles of the Volga, Russia's great interior river, and the Bolshevist armies were retreating rapidly before them. The Siberians were advancing on both banks of the Kama River.

South of Archangel, forces of the North Russian Government were pressing every advantage, driving the Bolshevists back and capturing guns and materials as well as prisoners, while Bolshevist reserves were withdrawn to meet the advancing right wing of the Siberian army.

It was announced on April 23 that Japan had decided to join the British, French, American and Italian Governments in recognizing the government of Adm. Kolchak.

On April 24 the Bolsheviki in North Russia were reported in full retreat, while throughout the Ukraine the peasants, encouraged by the reverses suffered by the Bolshevist armies, were rising making extremely uncertain the whole position of the Bolshevist army.

The situation on April 24 was such that a little further advance by the Siberians or the Ukrainians, or both, would outflank the Bolshevists in Odessa and the Crimea.

Ukrainian troops on on April 23 had driven the Bolsheviki out of Kiev.

There was a rumor on April 22 that the Soviet Government of Bela Kun had been overthrown in Budapest, owing to the close approach of Rumanian forces, which had defeated the Bolshevist army in Transylvania, Bela Kun was reported to have asked for an armistice, and to have declared his readiness to retire in favor of a Socialist Government in Hungary. Rumanian troops on April 24 had reached Debreczin, 120 miles due east of Budapest. On April 26 the Hungarian armies facing the Rumanians were reported as in utter rout and rapidly surrendering. Czechoslovak troops were within 20 miles of the city at Waitzen, French troops were assisting the Rumanian army which had been joined by a large number of Transylvanians.

British dispatches of April 23 reported labor troubles in all parts of Germany as yielding to solution and the laborers returning to work in increasing numbers. Coal production was increasing and the authorities were gaining control in every place where there had been disorders. Hamburg was still under military control. Allied food distribution was said to have been a big feature in improving the situation. Herr Noske, Minister of War in the German cabinet, declared on April 28 that Bolshevism had been beaten in Germany. Its only hold was in Munich, which was under attack by Bavarian, Wurtemburg and Prussian troops, the reds facing defeat.

President Wilson's Statement Regarding Italy

Issued in Paris, April 23, 1919

IN VIEW of the capital importance of the questions affected, and in order to throw all possible light upon what is involved in their settlement, I hope that the following statements will contribute to the final formation of opinion and to a satisfactory solution:

When Italy entered the war she entered upon the basis of a definite private understanding with Great Britain and France, now known as the Pact of London. Since that time the whole face of circumstances has been altered. Many other powers, great and small, have entered the struggle, with no knowledge of that private understanding.

The Austro-Hungarian Empire, then the enemy of Europe, and at whose expense the Pact of London was to be kept in the event of victory, has gone to pieces and no longer exists. Not only that, but the several parts of that empire, it is agreed now by Italy and all her associates, are to be erected into independent States and associated in a League of Nations, not with those who were recently our enemies, but with Italy herself and the powers that stood with Italy in the great war for liberty.

We are to establish their liberty as well as our own. They are to be among the smaller States whose interests are henceforth to be safeguarded as scrupulously as the interests of the most powerful States.

The war was ended, moreover, by proposing to Germany an armistice and peace which should be founded on certain clearly defined principles which set up a new order of right and justice. Upon those principles the peace with Germany has been conceived, not only, but formulated. Upon those principles it will be executed.

We cannot ask the great body of powers to propose and effect peace with Austria and establish a new basis of independence and right in the States which originally constituted the Austro-Hungarian Empire and in the States of the Balkan group on principles of another kind. We must apply the same principles to the settlement of Europe in those quarters that we have applied in the peace with Germany. It was upon the explicit avowal of these principles that the initiative for peace was taken. It is upon them that the whole structure of peace must rest.

IF THOSE principles are to be adhered to, Fiume must serve as the outlet of the commerce, not of Italy, but of the land to the north and northeast of that port, Hungary, Bohemia, Rumania, and the States of the new Jugoslav group. To assign Fiume to Italy would be to create the feeling that we have deliberately put the port upon which all those countries chiefly depend for their access to the Mediterranean in the hands of a power of which it did not form an integral part and whose sovereignty, if set up there, must inevitably seem foreign, not domestic or identified with the commercial and industrial life of the regions which the port must serve. It is for that reason, no doubt, that Fiume was not included in the Pact of London, but there definitely assigned to the Croatians.

And the reasons why the line of the Pact of London swept about many of the islands of the eastern coast of the Adriatic and around the portion of the Dalmatian coast which lies most open to that sea was not only that here and there on those islands, and here and there on that coast, there are bodies of people of Italian blood and connection, but also, and no doubt chiefly, because it was felt that it was necessary for Italy to have a foothold amidst the channels of the Eastern Adriatic in order that she might make her own coasts safe against the naval aggression of Austria-Hungary.

But Austria-Hungary no longer exists. It is proposed that the fortifications which the Austrian Government constructed there shall be razed and permanently destroyed.

It is part also of the new plan of European order which centers in the League of Nations that the new states erected there shall accept a limitation of armaments which puts aggression out of the question. There can be no fear of the unfair treatment of groups of Italian people there, because adequate guarantees will be given, under international sanction, of the equal and equitable treatment of all racial or national minorities.

IN BRIEF, every question associated with this settlement wears a new aspect—a new aspect given it by the very victory for right for which Italy has made the supreme sacrifice of blood and treasure. Italy, along with the four other great Powers, has become one of the chief trustees of the new order which she has played so honorable a part in establishing.

And on the north and northeast her natural frontiers are completely restored, along the whole sweep of the Alps from northwest to southeast to the very end of the Istrian Peninsula, including all the great watershed within which Trieste and Pola lie, and all the fair regions whose face nature has turned toward the great peninsula upon which the historic life of the Latin people has been worked out through centuries of famous story ever since Rome was first set upon her seven hills.

Her ancient unity is restored. Her lines are extended to the great walls which are her natural defense. It is within her choice to be surrounded by friends; to exhibit to the newly liberated peoples across the Adriatic that noblest quality of greatness, magnanimity, friendly generosity, the preference of justice over interest.

The nations associated with her, the nations that know nothing of the Pact of London or of any other special understanding that lies at the beginning of this great struggle, and who have made their supreme sacrifice also in the interest, not of national advantage or defense, but of the settled peace of the world, are now united with her older associates in urging her to assume a leadership which cannot be mistaken in the new order of Europe.

AMERICA is Italy's friend. Her people are drawn, millions strong, from Italy's own fair countrysides. She is linked in blood, as well as in affection, with the Italian people. Such ties can never be broken. And America was privileged, by the generous commission of her associates in the war, to initiate the peace we are about to consummate—to initiate it upon terms which she had herself formulated and in which I was her spokesman.

The compulsion is upon her to square every decision she takes a part in with those principles. She can do nothing else. She trusts Italy, and in her trust believes that Italy will ask nothing of her that cannot be made unmistakably consistent with those sacred obligations.

The interests are not now in question, but the rights of peoples, of states new and old, of liberated peoples and peoples whose rulers have never accounted them worthy of a right; above all, the right of the world to peace and to such settlements of interest as shall make peace secure.

These, and these only, are the principles for which America has fought. These, and these only, are the principles upon which she can consent to make peace. Only upon these principles, she hopes and believes, will the people of Italy ask her to make peace.

The Week in the World's News

BUYING FOR VICTORY. On April 28 the Victory Liberty Loan was reported as being something over 15 per cent. taken according to official records. Unofficial reports indicated a total of sales nearer to the 20 per cent. mark in the first week of the canvas. A campaign for the wide buying of small notes was instituted with the second week. Samuel Gompers issued an appeal to American labor to invest in the notes in which he said, "If every American could behold that field of battle, there would not be enough Victory Loan bonds to go round." The loan was going well; the percentage of sales was greater than in the fourth loan at the same period, and communities everywhere were going over the top. Iowa and Michigan went over the top first as states, the priority being claimed by Iowa, contested by Michigan.

Publishers Urge Suspension of Second-Class Rates. The American Newspapers Publishers' Association at a convention in New York on April 25 passed a resolution urging the New Congress to either repeal or defer the increase in second-class postage due on July 1 under the act of October, 1917, until a Federal Commission of experts should have an opportunity to make a complete examination to ascertain the actual costs of the service and to determine principles upon which to base charges.

Samuel Gompers Injured. Through a collision between a trolley car and his taxi on April 27 Samuel Gompers was injured seriously. Two ribs were broken, the right hip strained and possible internal injuries were feared.

Influenza Toll in India. The British official dispatches of April 17 published on April 26 reported the death from influenza in British India of 4,899,725 persons out of a population of 238,026,240. It was reported that fully a million others had died in the native states.

Court Restricts Burleson. Federal Judge Landis in Chicago on April 26 ruled that the Postmaster General had no power to control rates for telephones and telegraph service within any state.

Iowa Enfranchises Women. The Iowa Legislature on April 22 passed a bill granting Presidential Suffrage to women, following Indiana, Maine, in this action. This makes 29 states in which have a form of suffrage, 15 of which grant

Reconstruction Through Education

The Leaven in China

THE Western ideas have overwhelmed Chinese conservatism in regard to women. Every Chinese girl born today owes something to America. She is born into a happier and brighter world because of the patient labor through many decades of Americans in China.

Such is the impression every ligent and observing traveler brings back from ta today.

omen in China had been subject to century-long adation. The position of the girl was just what as in the time of Confucius, long before Christ. n the high-born girl was a slave. The cruel tor- of foot-binding was only one example of the op- sion, venerable with hoary tradition, under which suffered. The slaying of infants considered super- us and their sale in the market-place were common urrences under the old order.

hen men and women from Christian churches suggested giving girls some of the joy of life, nese parents were horrified. One Chinese family atened to bury a girl alive if she unbound her . They meant it, too.

irls at first had to be coaxed into schools and their nts wheedled into keeping them there. For many rs the tireless foreign workers appeared to make e impression. Then suddenly the efforts of many rs bore golden fruit.

oday foot-binding is forbidden by law in China. ld-selling and child-murder are crimes, as in other countries. The ols for girls are full to overflow- and new ones are demanded every- re. Universal education is still a on of the future, but it is sure to e. China has sixty women physi- s educated in Western schools.

he spirit and the ideals of the na- have changed. In some parts the ple are embracing Christianity in ongs, considering this the founda- of a better social order. Where church is already established in na, the congregations are eager to their share by making their churches -supporting for the first time.

Teaching Indian Girls

HE Indian girl is proving herself capable of taking on the "polish" culture of her "paleface" sister. erever she is offered the advantage an education and shown the how the why of a civilized Christian she is even quicker to seize her op- tunity than her brother.

The woman pictured with her baby Louise, of the famous Navajo tribe, w an educated and refined product mission school, where she took a rse in domestic science.

o far, little enough has been done the Indians, and even today 16,000 ldren of school age are not in school. pecial attention is now being given to supplying the things for which many Indian groups are calling. The Methodists already are at work among nineteen tribes.

Efforts among Indians in general have suffered through the directing of too much attention to the grown men, to the neglect of the women and children. For instance, there are scarcely any Sunday school facilities for Indian children; 40,000 Indians are not supplied with any church facilities whatsoever.

Indian women workers will teach sanitation and domestic science to Indian mothers and try to bring the homes up to a standard so high that young men returning with a good education will not become discouraged and be tempted to go "back to the blanket."

The Visiting Teacher

"I GOT teachers enough now. I don't want none to come visiting me," said one truculent small boy who had just heard that a visiting teacher was to be added to the school staff. That was two months ago. The same small boy more lately was declaiming, "The visiting teacher she comes to my house all the time. She finds me a good place to play and some new kids to play with, and she sent me to the clinic. Now I got no adenoids or tonsils; last month I got a B report. Sure I wish all the teachers was visiting teachers."

The visiting teacher first made her appearance in 1906 in two Eastern cities. She acts as the link between the child and school. She studies the out-of-school surroundings of the youngster who is backward in his classes but who is not subnormal, of the one who is restless and uninterested because school seems very far away from life outside its walls, of the retarded child who is undernourished and seems to have reached the limit of his development, of the child who is trying to do both home and school work, and the child with home conditions so adverse that special care and guidance are needed. She is in no sense an attendance officer, but is a teacher with social training who tries to adjust the child to the school, or, as sometimes happens, the school to the child.

First of all, she goes to see the child's parents and establishes friendly relations with them. Then she finds out something of the family environment and attitude toward the school; how the youngster spends his leisure hours and how the school links up with his tastes and interests. When the cause of the child's trouble is discovered she makes a tentative plan of readjustment. Sometimes this plan includes enlisting the assistance of a playground director, a Big Brother, librarian, or club leader, a public health nurse, or a tutor; sometimes it simply means transferring the child from one classroom to another. Her work, like modern sanitation, is chiefly preventive.

As a result of the needs revealed by the Back-to-School Drive, it is expected that many communities will undertake the employment of visiting teachers.

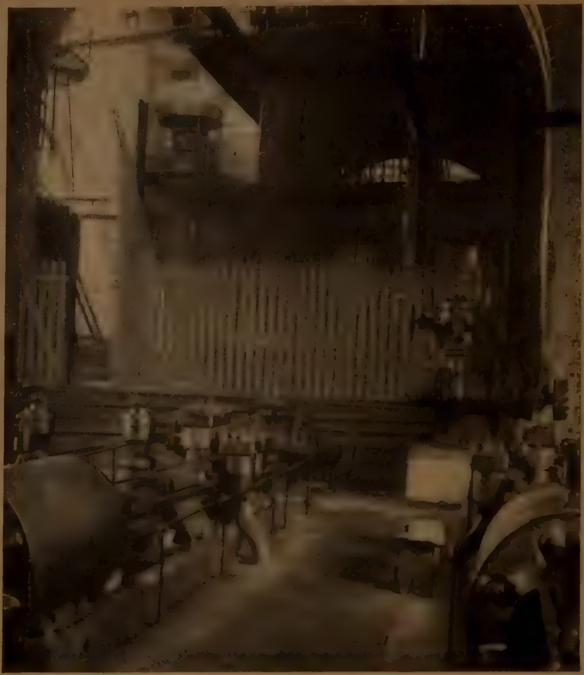
Scholarships for Children

"YES, father's lost his job and mother's sick. I've got to quit school, I guess. We need the money." The girl who told this to her teacher the other day is fifteen and doing well in high school. She is bright and her family have been making every effort to give her a good education. She wants to stay in school and become a teacher herself, but now the family demands are making her leave school.

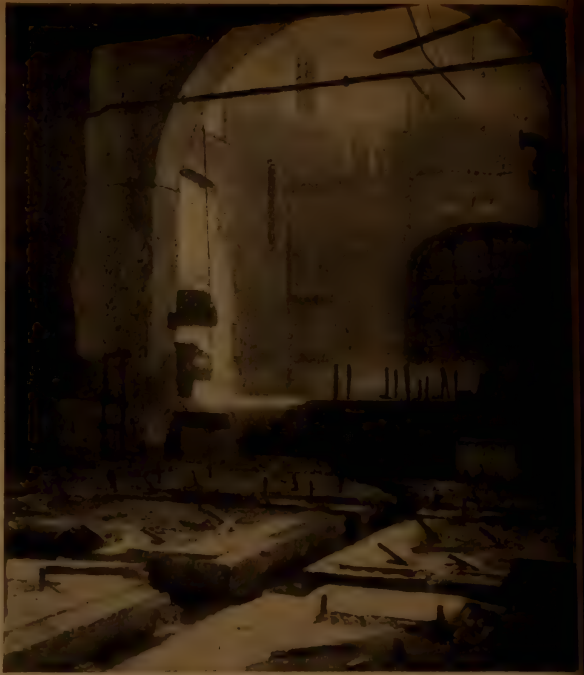
Every year thousands of children like her leave school at fifteen and earlier to help eke out the family income. But education through the sixteenth and eighteenth years really pays. In a small sample study, the wages of children who left school at fourteen were compared with those of children who stayed in school until after they were sixteen years old. After three years of wage-earning the average earnings of the child who stayed in school until he was sixteen were two and one-third times that of the child who left school at fourteen years of age.

The question is how to make it possible for children who wish to continue their education to stay in school. Scholarships from private funds are granted now in New York and Chicago, for instance, to public school children who are exceptionally bright and to children who without additional training could not become self-supporting. In Chicago and New York it costs on the average $120 to keep a child in school for one year. For lack of this sum many a child is unable to stay in school and a "large proportion of genius is lost because it perishes for want of opportunity."

In the United States thus far scholarship funds have been privately administered.



A Belgian factory before the Germans came



The same factory as it appears today

THE WRECK OF BELGIUM

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IN FRONT of me the hearth fire flickered, crackled, danced. I stretched my hands out to the grateful warmth of it before I spoke.

"Belgium," I said at last, "hasn't seemed at all pitiful to me. I expected to see want and misery everywhere. But here, in Brussels—well," I laughed, "there doesn't seem to be any startling misery in Brussels! There's plenty of food to be had, and the folk one meets wear splendid clothing. There's butter and sugar, always, without the least difficulty. Why, I expected—" I paused.

Brand Whitlock, his slim length thrown back in a great armchair, was watching the fire with a curious intensity.

"Folk who come to Brussels," he said at last, "are very apt to judge Belgium by the noisy streets, the hotels, the too loud laughter, and the jazz bands. But underneath the laughter—" He paused.

"I wonder," I said eagerly, "I wonder if it would be possible to bring out what's underneath the laughter; have some sort of a social service center in Brussels—the same sort of settlement house that we'd have in one of our own big cities? It seems to me—" suddenly I was quoting Major Blommaert, "that Brussels needs a moral broom to help her—clean up. And if Brussels could see a new light of—of hope, I'm sure that light would be reflected all over Belgium. It seems to me that a settlement house, a real place of ideals that would give young people a new set of values, would be the best sort of a moral broom."

"The situation here," answered Brand Whitlock slowly, "is different from the situation in almost any country. You can't go out, here, and gather together a committee composed of the Baptist minister, and the Presbyterian minister, and the Methodist minister, and the Episcopal minister, and say, 'Let's start a settlement house!' There isn't any Baptist minister, or any Presbyterian minister. There isn't a Methodist minister, or an Episcopalian one! This is not a Protestant country. And things must be gone at in a different manner, and through the recognized church. That's why your idea might not be successful—why it would certainly be more difficult to get a settlement house established."

We were sitting in Brand Whitlock's study in the American Embassy—a great cheerful room with wide windows and a splendid fireplace. It wasn't a Belgian sort of a room—it was a good American room, a room that looked as if a man lived in it. It was a room with deep cozy chairs, and a flat-topped desk; with a couple of good Oriental rugs on the polished floor, and one or two worth-while pictures set against unobtrusive wall-paper. And Brand Whitlock, immaculate in a perfectly fitting morning coat and pearl-gray trousers, matched the room.

"Just what," I asked after a silence that lasted for perhaps five minutes, "just what does Belgium really need? Just what has hurt Belgium more than anything else? I'd really like to know."

"Everything has hurt Belgium," answered Brand Whitlock. "She has known poverty, degradation, unbelievable bitterness. No wonder she sneers now. What has hurt Belgium more than anything else, you ask? Ah, you should see—" He hesitated, as if in thought.

I stared into the fire and tried to build pictures in the red coals of it—pictures of what I should see. I wondered whether it would be a ruined village, or a grave-strewn battlefield, or a broken cathedral. I wondered . . .

"The factories at Charleroi are the most terrible," said Brand Whitlock, suddenly breaking into my wonderings. "You should see the factories—of Belgium. I'll send you a car."

And that is how—and why—early the next morning, I started off on my trip to Charleroi.

THE way to Charleroi lay through well-cultivated country—through country that looked as if it had had its face washed and its hair brushed—country as primly docile as a child who has been started off to school with a clean hanky and a red apple for teacher. The roads were smooth despite the fact that, as the officer who was my guide told me, "They 'ave 'ad nothing done for these four years; an' the great heavy motors of the Germans passing over them every day, too!" The only signs of devastation along the way were the great trees that had been cut down beside the road, great trees that had been growing in their pride for many hundreds of years.

"Th' enemy!" observed my guide with something that was not quite bitterness and not quite vindictiveness in his tone as we passed a great pile of tree trunks, sawed into great lengths for kindling.

Forests we passed, neat forests that gave the effect of having been planted with mathematical precision. And, about every ten kilometers, we would swing sharply into a little town.

Up through Belgium the English troops are quartered, and the English colonials. As we went from town to town we saw soldiers everywhere. Some towns were gay with the bright tartan of Highland regiments; other towns were jaunty with the tipped-back hats of the Anzacs, or the swagger uniforms of the Canadians. Our car flashed past companies at drill, troopers taking their horses out for exerc officers galloping across country. And wherever passed we were followed by cheers—for the sight girl, obviously not a Belgian girl—was, as a lo Tommie told me—

"Like a little bit of 'ome!"

Half-way between Brussels and Charleroi we pas the battlefield of Waterloo, and our chauffeur, a murmured request from my guide, drove sl around the place that had been a turning-point world history. Rather like a great golf course seemed with gently rolling fields that were green spite the winter weather. In the center of the grou stood a huge grass-sodded pyramid, vivid against paler sky, and on the top of it a stone lion, beautif modeled, symbolized to the world an army that st immovably against its foes. Far up at the top of pyramid I could see the brown of an English unifo the scarlet of a plaid kilty.

"They go," my companion told me, "some of th and every day, to see the Lion of Waterloo. It h mean a great deal—to them!"

Another little bit of 'ome! Oh, I understood.

CHARLEROI is a smoky city—a place of chimn and coal breakers; a place of soot, and buildi that have been irreparably stained by the blackn of that soot. It is rather like Pittsburg at first sig —or like any other city in our mining territory.

I had never thought of Belgium as an industr country. Belgium, in my thought of it, had alwa been an enlarged—much enlarged—painting of t Angelus. Geography slips easily from the mind, a Belgium had been touched on but lightly in my geo raphy book. I had pictured Belgium as a nation peasants who wore scarlet handkerchiefs about th heads, and smocks that were vividly blue. I had p tured them walking, with a free barefooted stri through their little farms. For I had thought th Belgium was composed entirely of quaint little far set at regular intervals, with quaint little villages.

But as we rolled through the even streets that on the very outskirts of Charleroi I reversed my op ions. For my guide made certain statements th astonished me.

"Belgium," he said, "ees primarily a country manufacture. Her industry has always been the pri of Belgium. But now—" he shrugged his shoulde expressively—"you shall see!"

We rumbled across a bridge and were in the ma city—a city swarming, as all Belgium is swarmin with the varied uniforms of the British army. went slowly through the traffic—for Charleroi is busy place, and the traffic is fairly heavy. We cross another bridge.

Look down"—it was my guide speaking, his ex- l hand on my arm—"it is the German prisoners shall see, there below us. They are rebuilding t they have broken. Ah, but they can never help lace more than a few ruins together, and they have royed so very much!"

looked down to the horde that toiled there below A gray-green horde (ah, but Belgium has learned now that gray-green uniform!) with the queer asy hats that are so typically German. They were king methodically at some simpler form of building acing brick after brick, with a sullen precision. y paused and looked up, with stupid expressionless s, as we went by above them. And then fell to working again—working with same sullenness and the same precision arent in every line of their stiffly held ies. I noticed that they were guarded erect, heavily armed soldiers.

E WENT first to the ateliers of the Constructions Electriques. This ory was one of the largest in Belgium, it supplied a great part of the world electrical appliances. But the wheels he great machines are silent now, and y of those great machines are gone.

he manager of the factory closed his when we arrived and took us into the n factory.

e was a little man who spoke with a clear, ost Oxford speech, and he was crushed er the weight of his broken life-work.

They took almost all of our machinery away," he me; "where, we do not know. Most of the ma- ery that you still see is not our machinery. This" is gesture swept the length of a room crowded with ll belted machines—"this room has been used e the German occupation for the making of files. bon Dieu—" he half-groaned, with a master elec- ian's disgust at the thought of files, "knows why! y did not want files. These machines are gathered ether from all over Belgium. Every day some fact- -owner claims one of them, or two."

He lead us sadly, silently, through the saddened, nt rooms. For nothing is more hopelessly quiet n a factory that is not humming with work. He wed us the bare places in the floor where giant bits steel had been torn away—he showed us destroyed amos, and useless smokestacks. He showed us ptiness, desolation.

'In a year—" he told us, "perhaps we might be e to assemble enough machinery to go on with our rk. In a year—perhaps. But we have not the money to pay for new equipment.. Germany will pay for the damage that she has done—in time. But that time may be a long while in coming. For Germany has much to pay for, and the damage to our plant is not the only damage that has been done. Other factories have been destroyed much more terribly than our factory has been destroyed. Our factory has merely been stripped. Other factories have been torn apart. I will, if you wish, take you to another place—a place that has been almost completely swept away."

The way to the other place lay through streets that were typical factory-town streets. Little gaunt houses, smoke-gray in color, stood on both sides of the road, and small ragged children ran to the doors and windows of them to watch us as we passed. The children were barefooted, many of them, and wore curious shawls pinned tight across their thin chests.

The little manager of the Constructions Electriques must have glimpsed the thought that was going through my mind, for he spoke abruptly.

"It is hard for the children," he said with a wan bitterness in his voice. "The working classes, all through Belgium, are the ones who will know the most ghastly suffering. With the factories closed they will either starve or move away to some place where there is work to be had. Where can they go? To England, perhaps, or America, or Canada. And, if they do go, what will happen to Belgium? They must have a chance to work to live, while the factories are being rebuilt. But if they find work elsewhere, Belgium will die industrially, even if her factories are rebuilt! With her great plants in running order and no men to operate them—" the little manager threw wide his hands, hopelessly. "It is a great problem!" he said, and sighed.

We reached the second factory—the Providence Steel Works. And we were shown into the room of the manager—a stout man with a red face and nervous hands. When he spoke to me of the Germans his face grew redder and his hands became more nervous.

"They occupied Charleroi," he told me thickly, "from August 22, 1914, until the 15th of last November. They brought into Charleroi, when they came, some 13,000 tons of raw material to be worked on. They took away, before they left, 56,000 tons. How did they get it, you ask? They got it by melting up machinery—some of it delicate machinery worth $100,000 apiece. You wish to see my factory? Ah, mademoiselle, there is not much to see—now."

There was not much to see. There were only crumbled walls, smashed-in doorways, and groaning chasms that had once been floors. What in the other factory had been emptinesss, was in this factory chaos. The other factory had been a shell, merely. This factory was a broken shell.

"This damage would have amounted to five million dollars according to pre-war values," the little manager of the first factory told me in a whisper. "Now—well, perhaps $20,000,000 would cover it!"

The manager of the second factory caught the whisper, faint though it was.

"My firm has lost three factories," he told me; "two were in France. The total damage, in after-the-war values, amounts to nearly $50,000,000."

I gasped. "Not $50,000,000!" I stammered; "not—"

The second manager laughed harshly.

"We are not the only ones!" he said bitterly— "Of course," he added, "we have no money to rebuild. And, if we had money, the rebuilding would take three years—perhaps longer."

THAT is the factory situation in Belgium. And it is of the most vital importance. It may result in anything; in famine, disease, rioting, or a lasting desolation. It may result in revolution and death.

Germany will pay—she will be made to pay! She will pay for the damage that she has done to the factories. But can she ever hope to pay for the lives that she has bruised—for the little children who, because of those damaged factories, haven't any bread?

For her factories are the very pulse of life to Belgium. And that pulse is just barely stirring. It if stops, entirely . . .

CHINA'S CRISIS By Sherwood Eddy

Secretary for Asia of the International Y. M. C. A.

HIS is the second of a series of articles which Mr. Eddy, one of the ablest students of conditions in the ient, has promised to send to the Christian Herald from e to time while on his present globe-circling trip. The ristian evolution of the Asiatic republic is here boldly eshadowed. China may yet be able to claim world dership in Christian Unity.

E HAVE just spent a week in Shanghai and mid-China. We spent one crowded day at the Bap- t Mission College, with interviews every moment tween meetings. Last Sunday twenty-one of the dents, chiefly from Confucian and non-Christian mes, were baptized and entered the Church. Others ll be admitted soon. At the time of our last visit, interpreter was the leading non-Christian student posed to Christianity. He made his decision during e former meetings, and is now working as a Christian cher to win and train his students for Christian dership in China.

After holding meetings in the various colleges of anghai, I spent the last day ashore in the old city Nanking, the former capital of China. As you stand the ancient drum-tower, built before Columbus covered America, you look out upon the great wall ich runs for twenty-two miles around the city. The cient examination halls of China's classic past are ing torn down to build the new China of the future. We addressed a meeting of the Chinese Christians Nanking, who with the foreign missionaries are now ming together in a federation of all the churches, th one name, "The Christian Church," and one ntral executive committee in control, that shall do ay with denominational names, competition, and erlapping. Churches and workers will be placed here they are needed, and the Christian Church will esent a united front here in the heart of the non- hristian world. The Chinese Christians have little thusiasm or sympathy for our denominational dif- rences. So far as I know this is the first city in the orld to thus unite the churches. It will be followed by her cities in China and in Asia, and will in time help to end our denominational divisions in the West.

HAD come to Nanking chiefly for three important interviews. The first was with Mr. Wen, a Chinese ficial and advisor to the governor on foreign affairs. ght years ago he came to Shanghai as a Confucian ficial to meet Dr. Mott and myself and to request Y. M. C. A. building for his city. Four years later when I visited his city, at a banquet given by the governor, after an address on "Christianity China's Only Hope," this man made an immediate decision and entered the Christian life. He was baptized the following Sunday, and stated his position boldly before a crowded theater full of students. This week I asked him if at great sacrifice he would give up official life, forego his large salary, his chance of promotion and a possible governorship, to enter Christian work as a Y. M. C. A. secretary. With splendid courage he accepted the call, and we waited upon the governor to secure his release. After an hour's interview on the present crisis in China and the need of developing the moral character of China's young men for her future leadership, the governor consented to release him.

The second interview was with another Chinese official, Mr. Wang, the assistant commissioner of police. On our last visit this man was sitting in the front seat at the opening meeting, with fifty other Confucian officials. At the last meeting he left the officials to come to the platform as the Christian chairman of the meeting, boldly announcing to the audience of a thousand non-Christians that he had accepted Christianity as the only hope of saving China. He also is now considering resigning his post to enter Christian work.

The third interview was with the delegates, who had come from North China to meet the representatives of the South in an effort to make peace and end the Revolution in China before assembling of the European Peace Conference. We discussed fully China's political crisis, meeting first with the representative from the North and then with the leader of the South. We told them that all the world was looking on in the hope that China could make peace. I told them, and they agreed with me, that I believed there were four possible alternatives in the present crisis:

(1) China has now one last chance of making peace and herself saving the situation from within. This can be done only by immediate reconciliation between the North and the South, by ending the widespread graft and corruption now prevailing among the officials in China, and by doing away with the dangerous power of the half-dozen military governors, who, with their provincial armies, control the civil government and financial affairs.

(2) If China cannot speedily put her house in order politically, and conditions continue to grow worse, she must drift into bankruptcy, division, and the temporary or partial loss of her independence. Bandits are increasing. Civil strife is growing. She is gradually losing many of her economic resources and her political autonomy.

(3) If China does not end her dissensions, another power, which has already taken possession of a large proportion of her coal and mineral wealth, railway and commercial concessions, and some of her territory, may endeavor to control China politically and economically. This is what China most fears.

(4) If China cannot control her own situation, if she becomes bankrupt, and pressure is brought to bear for her exploitation from without, a group of powers may take over the finances and some regulation of the government of China under an international control or receivership for a period of years. Many Chinese leaders are now suggesting such a control. But it should never be permitted except as a last resort. Should this occur, there would be a widespread awakening of patriotism, the growth of education and democracy, and we would then have time to train a sufficient number of Christian moral leaders to enable China to resume her independence and autonomy. Her chief danger is selfish division and bribery within and a selfish exploitation from without.

NOW is the time to help China in her hour of crisis and need. This great nation that has witnessed the fall of all the other ancient world powers, that has outlived twenty-four dynasties throughout forty centuries of civilization, numbering one-quarter of the human race, is yet to have a great future. Her people are among the most industrious, intelligent and honest in the world, but her officials are betraying them.

In the recent United War Work Drive China raised more than a million dollars gold with great enthusiasm. Students eagerly contributed to the fund, and marched in thousands in enthusiastic parades in the capital cities. President Wilson is hailed today throughout the Chinese press as "a second Confucius!" And China now looks to America as her best friend.

Arrangements were made for us to meet the president, the cabinet, and the parliament in Peking. The delay of our steamer prevented our meeting these engagements. The governors, provincial parliaments, officials and students of China are open today as never before. I am now on my way for a brief visit to Southern China and then on to India and the Near East. But I leave China torn with a desire to remain in the heart of this greatest opportunity before Christianity in the non-Christian world today.

Substitutes for the Saloon

How the Conditions Have Been Met During Forty Years of Prohibition in Kansas

By ALFRED G. HILL

Topeka Railroad Y. M. C. A., dedicated in 1903 by Theodore Roosevelt, and since then particularly successfu meeting needs of railroad men for a "Democratic Club"

AN INQUIRY for a substitute for the saloon in Kansas—if one has been developed during the forty years of Kansas prohibition—brought this answer from a veteran educator and minister who has been active in the state's life during the period:

"Your inquiry concerning a substitute for the saloon in Kansas reminds me of the famous chapter on snakes in the book on Ireland: 'Chapter 45, Snakes in Ireland. There are no snakes in Ireland.'

"No specific substitute for the saloon in Kansas can be named because the saloon has never had a place in the Kansas social order even before prohibition was put into the constitution. The saloon has never been an open, recognized place of public meeting. When Kansas adopted prohibition, the state was just emerging from crude pioneer conditions into a community life of settled homes with a minimum of transient population.

"But without the saloon competition, the state since this stage has developed churches, schools, neighborhood social activities, public libraries, and various lines of amusement activities far beyond the development of other states. Frankness compels the admission that Kansas cannot offer specific substitutes for the saloon in larger cities, although it has learned lessons which certainly are of value."

Here are facts about Kansas that are closely connected with the absence of the saloon:

Kansas is considered the best moving picture territory in the country in comparison with states of similar population. There are 451 moving picture houses in Kansas, having a seating capacity for one-seventh of the entire population at one time.

There are 194,430 automobiles in the state, which is more than one automobile to every nine people, or better than an average of an automobile to every two families. The state's population now is 1,780,000.

Estimates of dealers show that a larger per capita consumption of candy and other sweets exists in Kansas than in surrounding states with saloons. Drug stores, "candy kitchens," and restaurants selling sweets are loafing-places for hundreds of younger men. It is a known fact that candy-eating increases when alcohol is absent. The experience of Kansas has proven this.

Thus, forty years of prohibition in Kansas, a wonderfully prosperous period, has caused abnormal development along three lines which furnish diversion to great masses of people. These are moving pictures, automobiles and the eating of sweets.

How this information may be applied is best illustrated by the experience of Fort Leavenworth. This fort is located on a government reservation. Here, contrary to Kansas law, a "canteen" selling beer was operated for many years. Finally the efforts of the Kansas officials were successful and the government cut off beer-selling in the post "canteen" or store.

It was up to the Fort Leavenworth officers and the Army Y. M. C. A. to meet the problem. The building in which the beer was sold occupied two floors and was used partially as a store of military supplies. This exchange was continued and in addition a restaurant and a soda fountain were installed. A tempting line of package candies was offered. This business continues today. The soldiers at Fort Leavenworth, usually four or five thousand in number, are largely from "wet" territory. For years they have patronized the "dry" canteen to the limit. Soldiers are great candy and pie eaters, and their consumption increased with the absence of beer. The soda fountain is rushed continuously during the hours in which the soldiers are at leisure.

Within a few yards of the canteen is the permanent Army Y. M. C. A. building. Long before the recent war started, this "Y" has been operated on the same basis as the Y. M. C. A. huts were operated during the war. Music afforded by pianos and victrolas, magazines and books, stationery and writing facilities have been the attractions for the soldiers at all times, with special entertainments furnished several times weekly. The facilities are taxed regularly.

The Railroad Y. M. C. A. in Topeka, a typical dry city of 50,000 inhabitants, comes near to serving as a saloon substitute in addition to meeting the demands of a community center. The Railroad Y. M. C. A. is supported largely by the railroads, with aid from membership fees. In one campaign at the Topeka institution, 555 members were secured. The usual Y. M. C. A. privileges are afforded, with particular emphasis placed on night schools and religious and social meetings. The attendance in these group gatherings is uniformly large. The railroad community around the Topeka Railroad Y. M. C. A. utilizes the place as a general rendezvous. Thomas Prout, the secretary, studies the desires of the men during their recreation hours. The billiard tables are popular. Smoking is allowed in the building. There are comfortable chairs in well-lighted rooms where conversation or games is the principal pastime. This Topeka Y. M. C. A. is utilized by hundreds of railroad men daily to an extent that exceeds any church community center efforts in the state.

A particularly successful community service church is that of which Dr. Charles M. Sheldon is pastor—the Central Congregational church of Topeka. Dr. Sheldon's desire has been to attract the men and boys to the church especially. There is a strong brotherhood among the men and a lodge for the boys with a pleasantly fitted basement to serve as club rooms. The equipment includes billiard tables, an attractive library and a victrola. There is a sister lodge for the girls.

It would be a natural supposition that social clubs would flourish in Kansas. The opposite is true. In order to keep these organizations alive, even in larger cities, frequent membership campaigns are carried on. The club without intoxicating liquor has not been an element to interest any great mass of men continuously.

The Masonic lodge, which has a different appeal than the clubs like those named above, flourishes to a remarkable extent, particularly in the cities. In the smaller communities the Odd Fellows are very strong. In Topeka there are 2,500 Master Masons and 12,000 registered male voters. The lodge in this case is a meeting-place for the majority of the 2,500 men.

These facts regarding conditions have been given as suggestive of what Kansas experience may do in aiding states which will "go dry" next year. It is significant that what Kansas has gone through indicates that organizations under the War Camp Community Service have been working along the right line in furnishing facilities for social and inspirational meetings, for meeting members of the opposite sex, and for eating and drinking. The demand for soft drinks and sweets increases with prohibition.

Kansas community enterprises, whether backed by churches or otherwise, have been most successful when operated along the liberal lines worked out by the War Camp Community Service.

In recent years, Kansas churches, along with others in the Middle West, have multiplied their activities in social service; the community center idea is growing in villages and in rural districts. The open school plant and the open church plant every day in the week, with features that make it worth while to the open door, is the ideal toward which Kansas is t ing, but not far in advance of its neighboring st

Prohibition and the Soda Fountai

For several years past the soda fountain has b an important factor in the fight for prohibition. W the saloons still open, a large proportion of drin have been gradually changing their patronage fr the bar to the soda fountain.

There are at present about 100,000 soda foun in active operation in the United States, and of th more than 80,000 are all-year fountains. The crease in these fountains is especially noticeable the crowded neighborhoods of cities. The open fountain, set behind a counter on the sidewalk, i growth of the past few years.

INDUSTRIAL READJUSTMENT

Governors of States Outline Their Plans for Meeting New Conditions

Mankind to Be Heard

By HON. HENRY J. ALLEN

Governor of Kansas

I APPRECIATE very much the opportunity afforded by the Christian Herald to give expression to my thoughts upon the most vital question of industrial readjustment which the world faces. Broader than the boundary lines of states and nations, or the settlement of many purely political questions which face the Peace Conference, is the urgent demand that the voice of the great bulk of mankind shall be heard in the determination of economic and industrial questions.

It has been more than nineteen hundred years since Christ laid down the Golden Rule. Out of the turmoil of conflict there seems to me to arise a more insistent demand than ever before that mankind shall pay heed to this rule; that the business of the world shall be conducted with due regard to all the people, and that out of the travail and suffering of the last four and a half years must come a nearer approach to the philosophy of Christ.

Specifically, I believe that the most important questions are a better relation between labor and capital, a better understanding of the problems of the producer and the ultimate consumer, a nearer approach of these extremes. That means the early termination of profiteering in the commodities necessary for the comfort and benefit of the mass of the people. That the greed of a small fraction of mankind has laid a heavy burden, from this cause, upon the great majority is beyond question.

More than ever before, the voice of the man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow is being heard, and justly so. I believe that intelligent thought agrees that labor is to have a far greater share in the determination of industrial and economic questions than ever before. I share this feeling and hope, and I think that the next decade will see many of the difficult problems worked out on a basis that will mean comfort, better living, better housing, and a fair share for those who bear the burden of production.

In this period of readjustment, that labor may not be unemployed I believe that government, national, state and municipal, should cooperate in necessary public works. As a matter of good practice, public work should be done during the eras of unemployment. In fact, there should be no such thing as unemployment for those who are ready and willing to work; and the best regulatory means is an intelligent handling of public improvements.

There is a debt of gratitude owing to the dead as well as to the living, who have actually borne the heat and burden of the great conflict which engulfed half the world. This debt can never be fully discharged. It can best be lightened by the effort of those who direct the affairs of the world, whether in religion, or business, or science, or politics, to work out a solution of the great problems that will prevent, if this is possible, another war with its great sacrifices, and, in the solution of these problems, to bring comfort, peace and happiness to the greatest number.

No Grave Problem

By HON. LYNN J. FRAZIER

Governor of North Dakota

IN NORTH DAKOTA the question of industrial readjustment is not so grave as in crowded industrial centers. We have no war-time industries to go out of business leaving the workers out of employment. The great majority of our soldiers came from the farms and are going back to them as soon as discharged. Others are getting their former positions or similar ones. I do not anticipate any difficulty.

Troubles in Arizona

By HON. THOMAS E. CAMPBELL

Governor of Arizona

INDUSTRIAL readjustment in Arizona presents many difficulties. This is a mining state. A large portion of the workers in the mines are foreign-born. In some sections the labor is almost wholly Mexican.

Into this mass of unshaped citizenship have been injected the vicious I. W. W. organizers, who preach the gospel of hate. They call it "syndicalism." It is the urge that labor produces everything. Government that prevents laborers from taking what they want from those who have should be destroyed. All churches, all labor unions, all elements for betterment are instruments of the enemy. Murder, sabotage, any kind of treachery are urged as virtuous if they help to destroy what they may not be able to take.

As governor of Arizona I urged the legislature to pass a law that would make it a felony to belong to an organization that was devoted to syndicalism. Such a measure was introduced but failed of passage. The reason was fear of the influence of individuals known as labor leaders.

American labor has no sympathy with syndicalism, with its trail of treachery, cruelty and essential dishonesty. But many leaders, together with many others high in the political world, seem to feel that their interests will be served by fighting for this murderous, treasonable element. As a consequence, organized labor is blamed for activities for which the individual members of the unions would have only condemnation.

Yet in Jerome, one of the sanest, best conducted mining camps in Arizona, the mines are today closed down and several thousand men will be without work for months. The only reason was the activity of the I. W. W. agitators, who, though only a handful of men, had sufficient influence to keep so many men from reporting for work that mines and smelters had to close.

America's need in reconstruction is for officials with the courage to suppress men who are enemies of our government. There should be protection for our industries through a proper tariff, so that labor to the maximum can be employed in all our factories in every part of the country; there should be a strict supervision and restriction of immigration, and industrial problems will solve themselves with little or no friction. And labor will, without doubt, be given as its right many things that before the great war were considered as of debatable propriety.

Waiting on Congress

By HON. ROBERT D. CAREY

Governor of Wyoming

THIS problem of industrial readjustment is a very deep one and to discuss it as it should be discussed would require considerable time and a letter of considerable length. It is my opinion that the most serious thing today and the thing that is doing more to keep business upset, is the uncertainty as to legislation that will be enacted by Congress. Those who have money to invest and business men generally hesitate to enter a new business or to make investments for the reason that they do not know how laws that may be enacted may affect their particular business.

Take, for example, the railroad problem. Development is at a standstill, railroad stocks are selling at low prices, all because people do not know what will be done with the railroads. The tax bills which have been passed have affected business, not so much on account of the bills themselves as on account of the fact that people figure that other legislation will be passed in the future.

If Congress would promptly pass all the measures that are considered necessary to bring about readjustment, and if the people felt that these various laws would not be changed or repealed for a number of years, business would quickly readjust itself.

INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY

The Shop Committee

By WILLIAM L. STODDARD

Formerly Administrator for the War Labor Board

BEFORE the war there had been experiments in the works or shop committee idea in this country. A notable early example is the plan of representation of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, where, following a strike of almost inconceivable bitterness, the Rockefeller interests glimpsed the dawn of the new industrial day and reorganized the management and men so that they might deal with each other instead of fighting each other. Other scattering specimens of this unit of industrial government were to be found before we went into the war, but they were only scattering specimens. Then we went in, and with our going began in earnest, because out of sheer necessity, to find some method of harnessing the two horses, Capital and Labor, so that they would pull together at the same time and by the same impulse.

Our government, through the National War Labor Board and other agencies, taking the best advice it could secure from both sides concerned, caught hold of the shop committee and pushed it.

The shop committee means organization, but it does not necessarily mean the trade union as we now know it. It means first of all the coming together of employer and employees in the factory as employer operating that factory and as employees working there—as partners in an enterprise. It means the orderly and regular coming together of employer and employees through a carefully worked-out system of primary, secondary and appeals committees. It means the coming together for the purpose of doing business together. It means that labor does business collectively with its employer. It means that labor has a voice in the actual management of the plant. It means not only that labor is in a better position to make known its grievances and aspirations, but that capital is also in a better position to make known to labor its problems and difficulties. It means that, to a certain extent and degree, the factory is run cooperatively by employer and employee.

But there still remains the fact that the idea is a new one and that it can go just so fast and no faster.

Giving Labor a Fair Hearing

By ALBERT SIDNEY GREGG

THE Rockefeller plan is aptly described as the "four partners of industry," the members of the firm being capital, labor, management and the public. The basic idea of this arrangement is that representatives of the labor groups have been given a seat in the board of management, and have a voice and a vote on questions hitherto determined arbitrarily by the owners.

President Lucius Tuttle of the old Boston and Maine Railroad long ago inaugurated such a system in a very simple way by inviting all employees who had a grievance to come in and tell him all about it. There was a quick response, and the president heard many complaints, and incidentally obtained a lot of valuable information about the road. But at length listening to complaints became so burdensome that it was necessary to devise another plan. So many troubles had been adjusted and so much good had been done that the president decided to create a board of arbitration, or conference board, for the purpose of hearing complaints and adjusting grievances.

This board was composed of officials in the "front office" and delegates from the railway's labor organizations. After the formation of this board the conventional labor agitator could not earn his salt stirring up trouble on the Boston and Maine, for the reason that the board took care of all grievances. In place of fighting the unions, President Tuttle utilized them to control the employees composing the membership. For instance, if a report came in that a certain engineer had been running by signals, the brotherhood to which he belonged was called upon to deal with him. Firemen, conductors, trainmen and switchmen were all handled in the same way.

The difference between the Tuttle plan and the plan of the Rockefellers is that Tuttle used the best possible plan to adjust grievances, while the Rockefeller method is designed to prevent the grievances from arising. Fundamentally they are identical, for both are based on giving labor an opportunity to be heard.

Churches Take a Hand

IN CLEVELAND recently over 1,500 tailors became involved in a strike which became acute because the employers refused to meet the men. Finally a committee of the Federated Churches took the matter in hand, got both sides together, and brought about a settlement.

Once the employers and the leaders of the strikers really got seated about a conference table, and each listened to the other, ready to make concessions, it was easy to find a common ground of agreement, and the strike was soon ended.

The big point about this incident is that both sides met and discussed common differences in a democratic way.

A big motor factory in Cleveland has challenged Bolshevism in an original manner. First, the pay of the men has been raised several times since the armistice was signed, and in the second place the employees are urged to attend the radical meetings and then come back and talk over their troubles with the management. In addition to this the men are given statements showing all the operations of the business and the reason for various rules and orders. It is quite unnecessary to add that this concern is having no labor troubles.

A Movement That Cannot Stop

SPEAKING or writing, Dr. Robert E. Speer is always sure of an audience. There is probably no man in public life in America today better qualified to discuss the "New Opportunity of the Church " the title of his latest book just issued. In this little volume of something over one hundred pages he throws out a challenge to the denominations: "Why not discard the authority of the old limitations in moral and social achievement? We may begin a new era of racial and national relationship if we will. The limitations and hindrances are not in God or in nature, but in us." Those who hold unselfishness in disesteem, who believe in mercantile principles alone, would lead us nowhere but backward, while the faces of those who once followed them are now turned forward. If the new order is to be won, Dr. Speer believes it must be attained by "a steadfast immovableness." No yielding or compromise on absolute moral principle must be thought of, although there may be compromises in method and process. "If I want a new world," he declares, "I must be the kind of a man I want the new world to be."

Henry Watterson wrote: "The paramount issue underlying Democracy is the religion of Christ and him crucified. This is the bedrock of salvation, of service and reservice, of all that is worth while having; not as a huddle of sects and factions, but as a mighty force and principle." Dr. Speer recognizes it as the business of the Church today to discern clearly and to preserve the true sense of its own mission. The war has not discredited the Church. It has made the Cross of Christ its most conspicuous symbol. It illumined and glorified the personality of Christ. It educated the world in fundamental Christian principles.

What has the Church learned through the war? Dr. Speer believes it has been shown the value of interdenominational cooperation and its possibilities. It has received a new revelation of the spiritual problem. Have we the dynamics for carrying out a scheme of new coordination and rearranging of activities?

Have we the men with courage and vision to carry it through? Churches may meet and discuss, but leaders of breadth and spiritual power are indispensable. Yet much discussion has passed and no adequate working plan to bring the denominations together has been reached, although they are absolutely necessary to each other and need mutual encouragement, inspiration and faith. Here and there a communion sees the application clearly enough, while others are still resourceless, and some are inactive or indifferent.

This whole situation is one that makes the strongest possible argument for the imperative need of Church Unity. For the churches, the tasks of peace are vastly more intricate and difficult than those of war. To face them successfully, they need mutual encouragement and help. They have seen how the nation has united to take up the tasks of peace. "These unities must not be allowed to rebuke us. . . . There must be cooperation to assure coordination of forces which aim at common ends and of programs which cover common ground. We must provide full interchange of knowledge and purposes," all working together efficiently for the same end.

Dr. Speer admits frankly that he does not know how this can be done, but a way should be found. His conclusion is that, having once started and accomplished certain tasks, the Church cannot withdraw. We have set out as a Christian Church in the great war; "there is no holding back, no stopping, until we get through—absolutely none! This movement of closer coordination and cooperation is never going to stop. It is going to grow year by year with increasing power."

We Finished the Job

VICTORY! How the word rang across this land as its free citizens, through three weeks, vied with each other in their support of the government by purchases of Victory Loan Notes!

They were inspired by the determination to finish the job—to furnish the government with the cash to bring the boys home, to rebuild France and Belgium, to feed the starving who cannot pay until their homes and industries are restored.

There were those who thought another loan would be difficult after the tension of war endeavor had been relaxed by the assurance of peace. But the Victory Loan has been taken more quickly than the Third Loan, in which we gritted our teeth and defied the German drive, or the Fourth Loan, in which we tasted the beginning of the ultimate triumph.

America's sons on the blood-bathed battlefields of France proclaimed in terrible fighting her strength of arm and soul. All the world looks to America as its savior, guide and leader. In the splendid response to the offering of this Victory Loan, America has again vindicated her right to leadership.

But her leadership cannot be fully perfected in lines of finance. At Paris, her ideals have come squarely athwart the ancient practice of diplomatic barter. Every people struggling for self-determination against the ambition of a powerful neighbor sees in America a disinterested friend and a possible protector. Here, too, we must be victors. President Wilson and his associates in Paris have well upheld America's declaration of the fundamental political rights of mankind. The job will only be finished when every subject people is forever free.

Unhappy Burleson!

NOT a single voice has been raised in the press in defense of Postmaster-General Burleson in his controversy with the World.

Whatever may be the outcome of this particular snarl, it is impossible to deny the fact that the whole course of his administration has been such as to alienate those who might have been his friends. His attitude toward the press generally and the periodical press in particular, and more recently his Czar-like methods in dealing with the telegraph rates, have made him universally unpopular.

It would seem that the time has arrived for the Administration to revise its opinion of our autocratic post office and telegraph management. Business men everywhere feel that it would be the proper thing to set up a new standard of dealing in both of these branches of the public service.

Ruined Royalties

WHEN the epic of the great war comes to be written, the poet-dramatist of the future will doubtless find in the tragic story of the Passing of the Kings a fitting theme to inspire his pen. History holds no parallel to this tremendous upheaval, which has emptied scores of thrones and driven into exile and poverty more monarchs and princes and nobles than all other wars in the last thousand years. In Germany alone, according to the record kept by a professor, 278 persons have been turned out of their former exalted stations through abdication or dethronement. This long list includes kings, queens, princes and princesses, grand dukes and duchesses, and a miscellaneous lot of other-titled parasites.

Prussia has sent adrift 63 of its royalties, big and little; Bavaria, besides its king and queen, has set adrift 15 princes, 16 princesses, 5 dukes and a duchess; the little principality of Reuss—which one's finger could cover on the map—has thrown out its 36 royalties and titles; and Brunswick has turned away its ducal couple and their royal offspring.

Looking down the long list of distinguished exiles, we find, after William Hohenzollern and his kith and kin, Ludwig III of Bavaria, Frederick August III of Saxony, William II of Württemberg, Friedrich II of Anhalt, Friedrich II of Baden, Ernst August of Brunswick, Ernst Louis of Hesse, Frederick Francis IV of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Adolph Frederick of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Frederick August of Oldenburg, Ernst of Saxe-Altenburg, Charles Edward of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, George III of Saxe-Meiningen, William Ernst of Saxe-Weimar, Frederick of Waldeck-Pyrmont, Heinrich XIV of Reuss, Leopold III of Lippe-Detmold. Then there are Carl of Austria-Hungary and his royal household; the self-important Ferdinand I of Bulgaria, and Boris I, his successor, all now repudiated by their people. Nicholas I of Montenegro is boarding at some Paris hotel where tipping is not compulsory. Constantine of Greece, whose shallow statesmanship and treachery lost him his crown, is eating humble pie in his Swiss exile. Ferdinand of Bulgaria is living on the limits somewhere in Austria.

It is astonishing how many of those who but lately were the great ones of earth are now reduced to financial straits. A king without money is an incongruous object, and a queen or princess who is reduced to pawning her jewels to pay her bills is hardly likely to enjoy living in her new station. Some few of the exiles who have been cut loose from their old revenues and associations have evidently resolved to try self-support. Prince Albrecht of Austria is studying agriculture, and Rupprecht of Bavaria, an ex-kinglet, is now a commercial man, presumably pushing sales. The great majority of the expatriated royalty and nobility are living in obscurity, glad to be let alone and with only one real trouble in the world, unfortunately is not likely to be assuaged. are woefully short of money!

The "Dollar-a-Year" Men

MANY of the "big businesses" of this co patriotically answered the call of the go ment at the time when it needed and ask the "dollar-a-year" men. They not only cons to some of their ablest executives responding t summons, but in many instances they unhesitat assumed the burden of paying such men a large of their regular salaries. This they did volunt feeling that in so doing they were really renderin triotic service. It was absolutely done without r nition, and none was desired. If any such recogn had been given, it should have been placed du their credit that they had acted liberally at a cr time and in a good cause.

An attempt has been made in certain quarte impute wrong motives to the packers in making lil allowances to those high-salaried experts who been summoned to government service. It was vious to all who cared to look into the matter, the concerns which voluntarily took up this bu did so from the sole motive that the men, by b kept on the payroll, should be the better able to der satisfactory service. Thousands of other triotic business concerns were following the s policy to hearten their men in service and help U Sam. It is worth while noting here that Food C missioner Hoover himself has testified that the " lar-a-year" men who came from the packing t rendered valuable service to the government, though the work to which they were assigned ha relation to the packing business whatsoever, being totally different lines.

It has been customary among a certain class publications to criticize the packers with or with reason, and lately the charge has been made t some of the large concerns had furnished bad bee the army. Seven such charges were made again single packing concern, and in every case the Fed Trade Commission, after thorough investigation, missed the charges and vindicated the packer.

"Herd-Life," as Galsworthy Sees

JOHN GALSWORTHY, the famous Engl author, now visiting New York, speaking a gathering in Columbia University chapel, d cussed what he regarded as a hidden danger to tional health and world welfare. "Herd-life," the domination of machinery, he indicated as an e which is much more acute in European countries th here, where it is just beginning to make itself fe Before the war, he said, the old nations were "rattli into a species of pauperism . . . due to the increa of herd-life based on machines, money-making and t dread of being dull." There is a tendency to e phasize too greatly the value of mere material thin and their production. We herd multitudes of hum beings in this task and make the masses of humani subservient to ingenious mechanical devices. Wo is needful, invention is invaluable; but there is possibility of overdoing the combination, and, as a sult, evolving a mode of existence in which the na physically deteriorates, and recreation, leisure healthful conditions become unattainable. power of America to give light and leading to the tions will depend not so much on her material wea as on her attitude toward life, and what her ideal civilization are going to be. Any nation which d not set its face against permitting its people to held helpless in the grip of selfish, blind indust reckoning nothing worth while but monetary succ is bound not upward, but downward.

Mr. Galsworthy views the whole question more the light of his experiences abroad than by anyth he has seen in America. The situation of the Ame can worker is radically different from that of worker in England, France, Italy and other co tries, as regards wages, social surroundings and o portunities for advancement. The English auth seems to have overlooked the fact that Americ industries are today leading the world in their prof sharing and other aids to the worker's independen The best times for American labor are to come, a they are now on the way.

THE GREAT CONTEMPORARY

A SERMON

By

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

XT—Heb: 13.8. "Jesus Christ, the same yester-oday, and for ever."

AND could the inspiring assertion have been embedded in more appropriate surroundings? It is engirt by counsels and commandments seeking the welfare and perfection of the soul. he one hand are counsels to brotherly love, to a l and generous hospitality, to the sacredness of y, and on the other hand the holy clarion calls for igilant avoidance of novel and enervating teach- the public confession of Christ, and the sacrificial unication of all that has been entrusted to men eir God.

d right in the very midst of these regal impera-, these exacting demands for a loyal and progres- y beautiful life, there lies the proclamation of my like some great engine in the center of a vast and factory, "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and y, and for ever." These busy and manifold mo-ies find their center and dynamic in him.

The same yesterday, and today, and for ever!" e same," but not the sameness of unchanging otony, not the quiescence and impassivity of the inx, which gazes with undisturbed countenance n all the changes of the fleeting years. No, it is some distant insusceptibility which the apostle laims, an austere detachment unaffected by the leness of human joys and sorrows.

is not the sameness of untroubled aloofness, for uch unbroken monotony there would be no sov-gnty which we could worship and revere. The espondences of God are infinite, and "his compas-s fail not." In our God we do not contemplate sameness of the rock-crystal, but the sameness of nitely expressive susceptibility, and in this "he is same yesterday, today, and for ever."

"THE same!" And therefore not identified and incorporate with any little systems devised by n, which profess to express and interpret him.

"Our little systems have their day;
They have their day and cease to be;
They are but broken lights of thee,
And thou, O Lord, art more than they!"

r systems change, and will change, and must ange, with the increased refinements of our percep-ns and the progressive ministry of the Holy Spirit. t we must never confound an intellectual system th the life it seeks to explain. I know nothing more ggestive than an hour spent in some great medical rary, observing the rows upon rows of bulky vol-es whose message has now become obsolete.

I remember once hearing a distinguished authority the medical world declare that in his own special partment, so rapid was the growth of knowledge, the text-books upon the shelves could be safely legated to the cellarings every ten years. "As a sture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be anged." And in some less intense degree it is the me with the intellectual systems, the human theolo-es, which center upon our Lord. "They have their y and cease to be."

There are vast theological tomes in my vestry which fered most congenial nutriment to their own day, hich to the men of that day were as sweet and juicy the dewy meadows to the kine, but which to our n time would present a meal as dry and indigestible straw. These theological systems are constantly anging. They change in their point of view, God ercifully ordaining that the emphases of the genera-ons should vary, in order that our vision should be-me reverently and fruitfully acquainted with all the any wealthy aspects of the full orb of truth. As-onomical theories have changed, but the glorious sun ines on in undiminished splendor and grace.

I know not what mighty changes are just now taking place in our theories as to the properties of matter, but the old earth swings along in her orbit and seed-time and harvest do not fail. A new element is discovered, and systems totter and fall like houses of cards! But the universe persists!

And so with all our human endeavors to express and interpret the Infinite; they are ever changing, but he abideth! Amid all the perspiring shiftings of our little day, Jesus Christ remaineth, "the same yesterday, and today, and for ever."

"Change and decay in all around I see;
O thou that changest not, abide with me."

NOW, if that be the expression of the general principle, there are two inferences which to me are full of comfort and inspiration. The Lord Jesus Christ, who is "the same yesterday, and today, and for ever," abideth all-sufficient through the growing years of the individual life. He keeps pace with our days. He is always our contemporary! The fulness of yesterday does not become the drought of tomorrow. When I introduce my little one to the Saviour I am introducing her to a life-long friend. Marvelous, and ever-growingly marvelous to me, is my Lord's adaptability, or should I rather say, our Lord's susceptibility, to a little child!

There is nothing more distinguishes the New Testament from the Old than just in the emergence and exaltation of the little child. "And he took a little child, and set him in the midst." That is the dawn of a new age. You will find nothing to parallel it in the Old Testament Scriptures, until you stand upon a great mount of vision with the most evangelical of its prophets, and, gazing down the misty vista of the years, and contemplating dimly some of the outlines of the golden age, it shall be seen that not the least conspicuous of its glories shall be the sovereignty of a little child. "And a little child shall lead them!" "And he took a little child, and set him in the midst."

Beautiful to me is the susceptibility of my Saviour to the little one! How he can accommodate himself to the little span of their comprehension, and weave himself into their desires and enthusiasms and hopes! But more beautiful still is it to watch how his stride enlarges with their years, and how he shares with them the pilgrim's sandals and the pilgrim's staff, when life becomes a grave crusade! He is "the same yesterday, and today" when we begin to shoulder responsibility, and to take up the burden of our prime. And when we reach the summit of our years, and the decline begins, and we march down through the afternoon toward the west where the clouds are homing for the night—when old age comes, with all its regrets and fears, he will be as finely susceptible and responsive to our need as in those playful, careless hours of the dawning, when first he called our names. "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, today, and for ever."

"Through him the first fond prayers are said
Our lips of childhood frame,
The last, low whispers of our dead
Are burdened with his name."

AND my second inference from the general principle is this—that the Lord Jesus Christ is the contemporary of all the succeeding generations in the evolving life of the race. Take the social and industrial problem of our own time. Can the Lord Jesus, who found an open door for our country out of the cold moral inertness and benumbment of the last century, find deliverance amid the feverish ferment of our own? Is the Saviour obsolete? Has he no relevancy to the struggles of our time? Is he played out? "Other foundations can no man lay than that is laid, even Jesus Christ our Lord." If we build on any other foundation, it is not a house we build, and still less a temple; we build a rubbish heap! I say, the Christ is our contemporary, and in him are the resources we need.

CHANGELESS

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

CHRIST never changes, though the way may seem
To be a way of trouble and despair;
Behind the clouds the sun will always gleam,
Although we think that only rain is there.
And Christ, whose love surrounds us every one,
Is changeless as the golden-hearted sun.

What can he offer us? He can offer us inspiration; that is to say, he can create the atmosphere in which alone our problems are to be solved. Can any one doubt that what we need above all things just now, in these overwhelming problems that are shouting in the streets, is the atmosphere of congenial temper and mood? And can any one doubt that the Lord Jesus is all adequate to create it?

I know the retort to which I am exposed. "Look at the churches," it will be said, "led by this contemporary Saviour of yours, and mark the atmosphere which is created for the solution of ecclesiastical problems and controversy! Is there anything more unclean in modern warfare than just the mood and temper of the sects? If that is the Christian atmosphere, no, thank you; we will make our own!"

Ah, but it is not the Christian atmosphere, and you know it! So far as modern ecclesiastical controversy is conducted in heated and unclean atmosphere, we have been disloyal to our Saviour in our blindly jealous guardianship of the fence of a sect. But you take any man who is in deep and serious covenant with his Lord, and whose supreme aim is to please and adore his Lord. What is the atmosphere which engirts and possesses that man's life? What is his spirit? In what kind of air does he do his thinking—fresh moorland air or the deadening air of a locked and tiny cabin? Why, the man who is in deep and loyal communion with the Lord is the subject of so powerful and delicate a ministry, so rare is the spirit that fills him, that the very obtuseness is wiped out of the lines of his countenance, and his very body is redeemed into spiritual refinement! If the Lord of the Church were profoundly accepted by the Church, in the resultant atmosphere the outstanding controversies would melt away like ice-packs in the solar heat.

YES, the Christ is our contemporary in this, that we need him for the creation of atmosphere, and nowhere is he more needed than in the vast industrial struggles which are now being waged. We are contending in temper, in class hatred for class supremacy, and we shall contend in vain. I am concerned that we should get the mood for solution, and then we shall soon arrive at the mode. Get the right spirit and we shall soon devise right laws. Get the life, and we shall soon have the light, for "the life" is still "the light of men." Make a man the friend of Christ, and you will speedily hear from his lips the sacred vow, "If I have taken anything from any man I restore him fourfold." When we have got the animal under, the soul will play the man!

And so I say that Jesus is our contemporary, and we cannot do without him! We need him for inspiration, to create a suitable temper; and we need him for illumination, to counsel our judgments. We shall never have secure evolutions until we have had profound redemptions. All wise and lasting reformation begins in the soul! How old-fashioned! Yes, and how old-fashioned are light and air and water and bread! And how old-fashioned is sin and guilt and disease! And how old-fashioned is the Saviour, and yet the contemporary of the most surging, immediate need, and the abiding secret of all permanent satisfaction. "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and today, and for ever."

Yes, "for ever!" It will be the "tender Shepherd" of our childhood, the strong Companion of our prime, and the solace and inspiration of our age, when we shall meet "in the morning." We shall "meet our Pilot face to face," when we have "crossed the bar." "For ever with the Lord."

Singing From the Heart

JOHN McCORMACK, whom many consider the most popular singer in the world, during fourteen war months gave concerts which yielded $500,000, every cent of which he gave to the War Benevolent Fund. In the American Magazine he gives the secret of his success as a singer. He says: "The mission of the singer is more than to produce perfect tones. If that were his chief duty, he might better sing just 'la, la, la,' since you can generally produce a better tone with 'la' than with any other sound. But a singer has a higher obligation. He ought to be the interpreter of life. His message to his audience is not 'do, re, mi'; it is the beauty of mother love, the thrill of patriotism, the joy of living, all the feelings that are behind all the tears and the smiles of the world. What is here," he touched his throat, "is much. What is here," touching his forehead, "is more. But what is here," and he smiled as he placed his hand over his heart, "is what speaks with the tongues of men and of angels." God gave him his voice. Training and work have given him his technique. But his message is from his heart to his fellows. Who has not heard some prima donna show great scope and volume of voice and practice vocal gymnastics? And with what amazement has such vocal skill been heard! But not a word of the singer was understood, as a foreign tongue was used, and then this same person in simple English would sing "Annie Laurie" or "Home, Sweet Home" from the heart, and the whole audience would burst into enthusiastic applause. So often congregations hire choirs to do their singing for them. Often the words supposed to be English sound as though they were foreign, and the heart of the audience is not touched. In other instances the organist, quartette and choir are in harmony with the sentiment sung, pronounce their words distinctly, and deeply move the souls of the people. Because the relation between the music and the heart and the relation of the heart to God is so intimate, the people in the church ought to do a good deal of the singing themselves and not farm it out to others. McCormack's singing illustrates the fact that the center of mental and spiritual life is the heart. "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life." (Prov. 4: 23.)

Bitumen in Dead Sea

BITUMEN in large quantities has been found in the region of the Dead Sea. It is used practically in the construction of roads. Scientific authorities believe that bitumen from the Dead Sea was used by the ancients for building purposes. The ruins of Babylon and Nineveh and other ancient cities reveal the fact that the bricks were fastened together by a cement made of bitumen. The asphalt pavements of modern times have been a great blessing to our civilization. They used bitumen in Bible times. It was evidently some bituminous substance with which the ark was made watertight. The command was: "Make thee an ark of gopher wood; rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch." (Gen. 6 : 14.)

Accidents Among Workmen

MODERN machinery has levied its terrible toll of accidents and deaths, and the people, angered at the large number of avoidable accidents, have put into the laws of almost all the states safeguards that these accidents might be reduced to the minimum. The owner's liability law cut down the accidents of the working people of this country one-half at a stroke. It is a reflection on human nature to appeal to the greed for money in the employer by threatening him with financial damage when an accident occurs to a workman. But this threatening did act as a prevention of fifty per cent. of all the accidents. At the breaking out of the war so many skilled workmen were taken into the service of their country that their places had to be suddenly supplied with less skilled men, and the accidents ran up again in their percentage to an alarming degree. But the experience acquired by the new men and the fine workmen that have come back from the war have stopped many of the accidents and reduced them to the normal number before the war. In the industrial reorganization of this country and the world there is an absolute necessity of giving the working people not only better protection in their tasks, but higher wages when the business will justify it, and a very much better fraternal spirit between the employers and the employed. The Golden Rule will settle all our industrial difficulties. "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." (Matt. 7 : 12.)

Divine Service on Ship

THIS is the great home-coming time for the boys. Shipload after shipload of the dear boys are being landed on our shores, mustered out of service and sent to their homes. What deep delight and outward demonstration their home-coming has produced! City after city has built arches and made devices, has had reviews and banquets, and the smaller places have shown their public gratitude in some way or other. The divine service held on the United States battleship Connecticut, loaded with soldiers coming home, illustrates a great fact, one of the most encouraging also to our American people, and that is that, notwithstanding the temptations of army life and the fact that some of the brave boys through weakness fell into temptation, the large majority of the men who won the fight for us and the world not only maintained their religious integrity, but also actually grew in grace, as the best testimony assures us; and they have come back to us strong in their manly virtues and Christian faith. The flower of America was taken away from the callings of civil life, the flower of the nation has come back to adorn their native land again. Those who went into the battle front and did not come back with the boys, went there in the firm belief of the same Book from which the sermon was preached on the Connecticut, and with the firm faith in its principle of immortality. As these boys parade our streets with marks of such military discipline and with such a firm step, and as they bow before God in the camp or battleship for more then mortal wisdom and courage in the conflict, they seem to have been obedient to this injunction: "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong." (I Cor. 16 : 13)

Mother Dies for Children

MRS. LOUISE MERCIER of Queens Borough, New York City, sacrificed her life the other morning in a vain effort to save two of her daughters, Lonia, six, and Helen, seven, when fire destroyed their two-story frame cottage. Her husband, and another daughter, Emily, nine, escaped by jumping, but both were burned and were sent to the hospital in Jamaica. All of them were sleeping on the second floor, the husband said. With him in one room was Lonia. Helen was with Mrs. Mercier in the next room. Emily was sleeping in a room alone. Mercier's wife woke him at five o'clock and told him the rear part of the house was on fire. Flames prevented him from going down the stairway, and he broke a front window, badly cutting his right hand. "I'll jump," he said to his wife. "You get the children, drop them out of the window, and I'll catch them." He leaped from the window. Emily, who had made her way from her room through smoke and flames, jumped into a net. "My wife came to the window once and then disappeared as though she were going to get the other children," Mercier said. "She did not come back again." Of course she did not come back; she went back after her girls, and she would not return without them, and so the three perished. This is the simple story of motherhood. Motherhood means heroism, sacrifice, life for others. How could any name be more like heaven than mother? And yet we are told that the love of our Heavenly Father for us is greater then that of a mother or father. "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." (Ps. 27 : 10.)

Horse Blown Into Tree

THE colossal impact of the gigantic mine explosions used by the Germans in trying to stop the advance of our men in the Argonne-Meuse offensive is shown by the photograph of a horse which was blown into a tree and hung there. After the armistice was signed and his duties on the Moselle River toward Metz were suspended Lieutenant Bernard Granville went all over the Argonne-Meuse battlefields of the First Army, and this picture he took is one of the souvenirs he has been showing his friends at the Friars Club his recent return. The True Story of the Real John and Letty

Miss Cynthia, since she knows the least about married life, has the most to say and says it with greatest cocksureness

HE SIFTING OF A SCANDAL

By CHARLES GRANT MILLER

HAVE taken peculiar interest in the back-fence gossip about the affairs of John and Letty, because I have known the old couple with long and loving intimacy, and had curiosity, which I t is pardonable, to see just how far neighborhood der might go unabashed.

o I silently stood apart while Mrs. Frances Inger- detailed her story of Letty's slaving to help pay the farm, of her wearing herself out in body and g crushed in spirit, of her poor request for a hes-wringer to lighten her labor being denied by n, of her leaving him at last and going out to dge, of John's claiming all the property as his own, is buying a fine span of colts and setting his heart a pretty girl over in the next township.

listened while what through a lamentable lack in language must be called a man gave his version. male one that gossips about neighbors' wives is as culous and disgusting as a rooster that tries to kle.

Then I bore with Miss Cynthia, who, since she ws the least about married life, has the most to and says it with the greatest cocksureness.

Don't mistake my attitude in listening. As I have said, I had a purpose. As the devotee of science takes a nameless insect upon the point of his needle and, crowding down his disgust, puts it under the microscope and dissects it for the sake of science, just so have I taken up this typical back-fence gossip and examined it for the sake of social decency.

After hearing it all, I went over to John's home, crossing the well-kept fields and approaching through the garden where John and Letty had flooded their little world with sweet odors and blooms. I saw the old couple sitting together on a side porch under the locust, watching the setting sun. One of his knotted hands was laid upon a withered one of hers. I heard his voice, and she answered something tenderly. It was a scene too sacred to break in upon. I stood still beside the lilac bush, with my eyes and my heart fixed upon them.

AND there a vision came to me. Whence it came I know not, but my soul tells me it is true. I saw John in his hopeful young manhood bring the happy, trustful Letty as a bride to the little house that stood on his few rented acres. It has taken years of toil to extend those few acres into a big farm of their own and to transform that little house into the comfortable one of today—years of toil in which both shared alike—toil that was lightened by love and sweetened by hope. Sometimes he had hired help; sometimes she had; sometimes neither; but what matters it? One does no more than one can, and neither of these was content to do less.

Why complain of work? It is the common heritage of humanity; it is the God-assigned process of physical, mental, moral and spiritual development and growth. It is by virtue of work that we may go out of life better than we came into it. It is not work that wears us out, but a lack of enthusiasm in it. Fewer of us wear out than rust out.

One day John, at a signal from the house, hastily took the horses from the plow, threw the heavy harness from one, bestrode it and galloped off for Dr. Brown. That night a little cry, that ineffably sweet message fresh from another world, proclaimed the union of John and Letty one of heaven.

After that the toil went on harder and sweeter than before, for now there was little John to work for and hope for. And after a while little Letty came, bringing to them more blessed burdens. And as the seasons came and went, with rich harvests and broadening acres, more children came, to work for, to deny for, and to love each other for, until there were seven.

For theirs was such a marriage as is the mother of the world, and preserves nations, builds cities, fills schools and churches; yes, like the useful bee, builds homes, gathers sweetness from every flower, unites into societies and republics, sends out colonies, feeds the world with delicacies, keeps order, develops the virtues, and promotes the sacredest interests of humankind.

The time came when young John must go to college. This meant more labor, more denial; but to John and Letty the sweat of the brow in such a cause was sweeter than wine. Young John is a good lawyer now in the big city, whose rush and roar have never drowned out his loving memories of the old home nor weakened its noble inspirations. Little Letty blossomed into beauteous womanhood and married, and the younger children, too, grew up and one by one passed out to found happy families of their own. A crisis had come in the life of John and Letty, now grown old in years but not in spirit.

I STEPPED from the lilac bush and went to them. "Uncle John"—we all call him "Uncle John," less because he is old than because he is always kind—"would you mind telling me the truth about that clothes-wringer?"

They looked at me, smiling but mystified.

"Mrs. Frances Ingersoll," I began, "has been saying—"

John cut me off with a jolly laugh that rippled smoothly for a moment and then suddenly rolled into a roar of merriment. "Her? Why, I,"—he gasped between irrestrainable gurgles—"I told her the other day that if she didn't stop pestering Letty and me with her tales about the neighbors, I'd wring her neck."

"Poor woman! she was much put out," Letty remarked kindly.

"And I hope she'll stay 'put,'" said John. "I want to be rid of all these here he-women and she-men that come around scandal-scavengering among other folks' affairs."

There seemed nothing for me to say, and so I sat on the porch step in silence. The sinking sun had flushed the sky with purple and flooded the earth with glow of gold.

"This is a great day with us," said Letty to me, "and I hardly know whether I am glad or sad. Our little Frank, our last, you know, was married this morning, and has gone from us, leaving John and me alone at last."

John's hand tightened upon hers. "Are you going to be lonely, Letty?" he asked.

"Not while God leaves me you, dear John," she said.

He bent over and kissed her cheek as tenderly as might one to whom love is new.

I LEFT them alone, with their rich treasure of affection and sweet memories, watching, with eyes steady and hearts unafraid, the setting of the sun.

This is John and Letty, as I know them.

God bless them! God bless them!

MAKING THRIFT A GAME

By JAMES H. COLLINS
Of the War Savings Organization

ABOUT the time the Marines turned the Prussian Guard at Château-Thierry, the workers in a big plant in New Jersey posted a map of the Western Front in a conspicuous place and made it the basis of a thrift game. Ten-mile circles were drawn upon this map, with Berlin as the center, and our armies at the circumference. Then employees pledged themselves to buy one 25-cent Thrift Stamp for every mile of the American advance. For convenience in figuring ten miles was taken as the unit, which meant $2.50 invested with the government by each person playing the game. Any worker was free, of course, to run ahead of the army in this game, and as a matter of fact most players in the game wound up at the armistice about one-fourth of the way to Berlin. This original idea was worked out by the employees of the Standard Underground Cable Company, Perth Amboy, New Jersey.

Many persons think of thrift as sacrifice, or self-denial, or at least a task. Uncle Sam finds that thrift succeeds best when it is made a game, and put on the same footing as baseball. The object in any game is to win something, and to win it over an adversary. There must be some way of keeping score. And a game brings people together for team play.

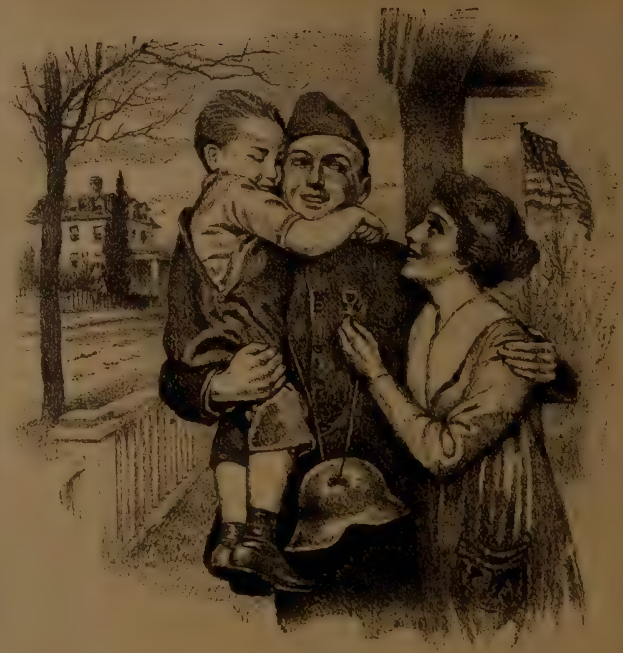
Thrift teams are rapidly being organized all over the country, in factories, stores, schools, churches, lodges and elsewhere, in the form of group savings clubs, whose members pledge themselves to purchase a minimum number of War Savings stamps each pay day. On this basis thrift becomes not sacrifice, or even mere money-saving, but constructive finance for one's own good.

It has been found that in every case results are better where some striking basis of competition is worked out.

In one large Eastern factory more than 400 separate group savings clubs operate in competition with each other, and monthly trophies are awarded to the club which leads in a given section of the factory, the score being kept according to the average individual purchases of Thrift Stamps by members each month, thus putting the small group on an even footing with the larger ones.

In another instance, salespeople in a retail store have organized for group savings, and invest all their extra commissions in Thrift Stamps, individual records being posted monthly, with the salesperson who has earned the most money in the lead. As every dollar invested in stamps represents extra sales and extra effort, there is a direct benefit to the business as well as to those playing the game.

Uncle Sam wants to see thrift developed ingeniously along such lines. During the war patriotism was the big motive for saving money. But now self-interest and the direct benefit to thrifty people themselves are the motives, and clever plans that put saving on the game basis are relied upon. The War Savings organization of the Treasury Department at Washington will be glad to hear of every interesting plan of this sort, so that good ideas may be made available to others.



The Victory Loan Cannot Fail

WE HAVE built a great arch across the world. Into it have gone the traditions and the hopes of the American people; men and munitions and billions in gold are parts of it; the blood-cemented friendship of the civilized nations of the world is in it, and the world's future rests upon it.

Only the keystone of the arch remains to be put in place, finishing the task and binding the whole together.

That keystone is the Victory Loan.

What if we fail to raise it in triumph?

First, and most impossible, such a failure would mean the repudiation of the men who have died for us—our own men. It would mean ingratitude and an unequaled hypocrisy.

Second, such a failure would mean the disruption of our industries, and, since we and the Allies are interdependent, their industries as well.

With one accord, the business of America turned from its accustomed channels to the winning of the war. Billions of dollars were spent by the government, and many bills remain unpaid for work done and for goods delivered. Until these bills are paid, the creditors will be crippled. The Victory Loan will pay them.

It is argued that if the Loan fails, the money can be raised by taxes. But taxes cannot be collected from a business that, for lack of money, is inactive. Taxes will not solve the problem.

The Allies owe us something more than ten billions of dollars. Why not call these loans? There is the commoner decency that forbids hitting a man when he is down, and the Allies are down, financially. The war has swept their treasuries bare, and two of them are sorely hurt. Consider France, with her five richest departments gutted; Belgium, overrun and ruined; England, strained to the breaking point. They need every penny we have loaned them for the rehabilitation of their own industries. If we demanded payment from them now, we should not only prevent their recommencing the production that will pay their debts, but we should make it impossible for them to buy from us, and so further hobble our own trade at a time when we need it most. We cannot ask the Allies for repayment now.

If the Victory Loan fails, the arch falls, for no arch can endure without its keystone. No heavier than the rest, no larger, it is the heart of the great structure we have raised.

If the Victory Loan fails, our country will plunge into an economic chaos, and, because our country is the richest and strongest of all, the rest of the world, harried and war-worn, as we are will be carried with us.

The failure of the Victory Loan mean the crumbling of the foun of mankind.

Washington's Thriftograms

GEORGE WASHINGTON, the founder of the nation, gave voice to rules for personal and national success which are as applicable in this 1919 year of necessary thrift as in his day. Here are some of his words on the use of money and resources that might have been written for the present situation:

"I am no more disposed to squander than to stint."

"Economy makes happy homes and sound nations. Instill it deep."

"It is not the lowest-priced goods that are always the cheapest."

"I cannot enjoin too strongly upon you a due observance of economy and frugality."

"Keep an account book and enter therein every farthing of your receipts and expenditures."

"Promote frugality and industry by example, encourage manufacture, and avoid dissipation."

"Reason, too late perhaps, may convince you of the folly of misspending time."

"There is no proverb in the whole catalogue of them more true than 'a penny saved is a penny got.'"

"Nothing but harmony, honesty, industry and frugality are necessary to make us a great and happy nation."

These wise sayings of Washington are paraphrased today in the injunction to spend wisely, save intelligently, avoid waste and invest safely, buy Savings Stamps and Liberty Bonds.

Willard STORAGE BATTERY

Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation

Hasn't had a drop of acid solution in it or any moisture in either plates or insulation—

—until it is filled and charged for you at the Willard Service Station.

"BONE DRY!" When I say that about a Willard Battery with Threaded Rubber Insulation, I don't mean that the acid solution has been emptied out. I mean that there has never been any solution put into it.

With a Bone Dry Willard Battery there is not a bit of moisture in plates or insulation from the time the battery is completed at the factory until it is made ready for use on your car. You can get this absolute bone dryness only in the Willard Battery.

To both users and dealers Bone Dry means two things, both extremely important; First, greater certainty of getting a battery without waiting for factory shipment; and second, assurance of battery newness.

Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation, which is in every Bone Dry Willard Battery also protects battery plates after the battery has been put in service. There's ample proof of this in the record of 35,000 Willard Batteries (all with Threaded Rubber Insulation) put into service over three years ago. A large percentage of these batteries are in use to-day supplying current as satisfactorily as ever.

There is the evidence—not what engineers say Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation ought to do, or what it could do in a well-cared-for battery, but what it actually has done.

Ask us to tell you more about Willard Threaded Rubber Insulation, also for a copy of the booklet "The Wick of the Willard."

IN MIDST OF BOLSHEVIS

By GENERAL SOCRATE KHAN

GENERAL Socrate Khan was formerly in the court of the late Moraffaredin Shah, the King of Persia, and aid-de-camp of H. I. H. the Prince Salare-Dovleh.

On account of the political unrest and the uprising of the people in Persia, he took refuge in America in 1906. In 1910 he was invited to join the new parliament in his native country. He has made several trips around the world, acquiring a vast knowledge of the international political and economic situations.

Since 1915 he has been in the East, a close observer of the eastern front, where he was acting as correspondent of the Armenian Daily, "Meschak," published at Tiflis, Caucasus.

In April, 1918, after the collapse of Russia and the appearance of Bolshevism, the general returned to this country, and as a loyal citizen of the United States joined the educational campaign as a "Four Minute Man," delivering speeches in different parts of the country for the Liberty Loan.

ON MY way through the Transcaspian country I met Askhabad, a Russian officer of high rank and great culture. We naturally fell into a discussion of the revolution which had taken place so successfully, when I saw a number of Russian soldiers with red badges and red sleeve bands, denoting that they were of revolutionary sympathies.

"That is a good thing for Russia," I said, "to see the soldiery itself with the revolutionary movement." But the officer shook his head slowly and a troubled look came into his eyes. "No," he said, "I am afraid not. If only the pendulum would stop now in its course! Russia has two symbolical colors—the black of the terrible reign and the red of the revolution. Czarism and its crushing power has had its black day and is now a thing of the past. But this red reign, will it stop with moderation? I am afraid not, because the Russian soldier and the Russian peasant are ignorant and used to oppression. Now what will they do with all this red freedom? It will soon turn to license, and Russia's ruin is not very far off."

This prophecy did not take very long to come true.

On my way through Russia I was aware of a high fever of enthusiasm. Every street corner had its shouting advocate of freedom. His eloquence was not intelligible even to himself, to say nothing of the rabble which was his audience, who nevertheless applauded uproariously. The truth was that the people of Russia, eighty-five per cent. of whom are uneducated and totally illiterate, had become intoxicated with freedom.

But what was the quality of that freedom? How did they interpret it? Here is a small anecdote which will explain the average Russian's idea of the noble freedom preached to him by the revolutionists in a frontier town of Persia. Several Russian soldiers wearing the revolutionary red came in laughing and jesting very loudly and coarsely. They demanded coffee, and the proprietor who brought it smiled and tried to make conversation.

"Ah, you gentleman are now free!" he said.

"Free!" cried one of the soldiers. "Yes, and we shall remain so always. No czar and no officers to make life miserable. Henceforth we can do as we please and no one to dictate. For instance, if you ask payment for the coffee I am drinking I shall refuse if I please, and if you insist—" he shook his clenched fist threateningly in the proprietor's face. Voilà, the ideal "freedom for Russia."

WITH this interpretation of freedom the Russian soldiery began their fine work of robbing, plundering and murder. Several towns I went through in Persia were absolutely barren; the "free" Russian soldiers had been through them. In Hamadan, where I had taken a small house, the pillage and plundering went on for three days, and only the blessed Stars and Stripes floating above my door saved part of my property which had been overlooked by Turkish and German uniformed pillagers. They burned and destroyed and murdered all they didn't wish to take back to Russia with them. And when they left officially, taking their loot with them, what a trail of misery and desolation they left behind! Their interpretation of freedom didn't include the rights of those other human beings who didn't happen to carry arms or have the brute strength that they possessed. It would be laughable if it weren't so horribly disastrous.

All this was under the Provisional Government, which laid a little restraint on the soldiers. They weren't allowed altogether to quit the occupied places, but in the course of time they formed a regular commercial traffic route between Persia and Russia and thus made enormous amounts of money.

This was the state of things at the beginning of the Bolshevist rule. Capital punishment having been abolished by the (socialist) Kerensky government, the red soldiers became absolutely lawless and unbridled, and when the Bolshevist agents said, "Leave your posts and go back to your homes. Why should you fight? We will give you land and wealth," the soldiers with one accord left the army and began to go back to their homes, leaving all the fighting fronts defenseless and weak.

TWO incidents which I witnessed will serve to show the moral breaking down of the army immediately following the revolution. The first took place during the revolution. In Tiflis, capital of the Caucasus, I visited the famous palace of the Grand Duke Nicholas, where in the dark days of czarism the death of so many subject nations and thousands of innocent people was decreed. This palace was thrown open to the People's Council who were once the most powerful officers of the czar's secret service department. I was astonished at the order and efficiency and quiet with which the whole thing was being carried out. This was before the abolition of capital punishment. But when no more fear of court martial and death existed among the ignorant soldiers, they goaded the people on to acts of violence, and when, in October, 1917, I visited the palace again, I witnessed some of the most dreadful acts of violence.

One day a young officer was trying to help his wife board a street car. A big burly private strode forward, pushed the woman away roughly, and almost treading on her boarded the car himself, whereupon the young officer reprimanded the private, who turned back and flung a vile word of insult by way of answer. In the car was an old officer of high rank. When he heard the private he jumped up and said, "Slovshi!" (listen): "What do you mean by insulting your officer?" The private turned his insolent eye on the officer. "And what is more," he said, "I do the same to you!" And he proceeded to fling the most dreadful string of epithets at him, whereat the old officer drew out his pistol and shot the private down.

Typical refugee crowd at railway station

Then there arose the most awful hue and cry, and about five hundred soldiers seized the old officer and beat him to death and dragging him to an old push-cart huddled his body in it and wheeled it to a bridge near by. One of the soldiers jumped up and standing on the body of the officer, his great heavy coat pressing down into the officer's face and body, made a frenzied speech about the glories of freedom. "Now," he said, "this dog has gotten what he deserved. Let all other officers take heed, for we will treat them in the same manner or worse. Now that he is dead, shall we take him to his family or fling him into the river. Vote!" Whereupon all the soldiers shouted, "The river!" and two of them taking up the body flung it out over the bridge. The mangled legs and arms made grotesque motions in the air. Some of the soldiers laughed cruelly, and after the splash the soldiers turned and each went his way, reeling a little with the sense of their wonderful "freedom."

BUT with all their violent demonstrations on the part of the Bolshevists, they were not able to absolutely demoralize the Caucasus. Why? Because there the population was more educated, being made up mostly of Armenians, Georgians and other intelligent people. When I was in Tiflis in the latter part of 1917, the government received word that the Bolsheviki in the Caucasus (made up of the soldiers who had treacherously abandoned their posts) were threatening an uprising. The government consulted the people, intelligent and prosperous Armenians and Georgians, and a handful of other Christian nationalities. They all emphatically did not favor Bolshevism. They said, "The Cossacks, who are anti-Bolshevistic, will guard our frontiers to European Russia and keep more Bolshevists from going in. We will deal with the ones here." They immediately ized; all the citizens were called and and were given sections of the guard. When the whole region was guard, word was sent to the Bolsh "If you dare to make any move, exterminate you." Thus was Bolsh suppressed at the time of the g menace and for all time, for now Ca is an independent region, proclaim kept independent and free by the nians and Georgians—free from the of the most oppressive so-called "free of Bolshevism.

But the situation was quite dif in Turkestan, Central Asia and Si through which I had to pass to get back to Am The people in this region being unarmed, defensele very ignorant, Turkomans, Sarts and Khin Khis hammedans, were splendid material for the Bolshe They were easily taken by force and procla Bolsheviki.

Here, Bolshevists had seized Tashkend, the c of the Transcaspian countries and Turkestan, were ruthlessly killing and robbing the popula When our train pulled in I was obliged to tra into another train, during which the faithful Bo viki robbed me of my valuable articles, jewels several thousand rubles in cash. There was no or proper authority where I could seek protec So I was happy when our train left that chaos.

ON MY way through Siberia in December, 19 met many young Russian officers fleeing country, hoping to get to Japan or America. T wanted to form a "legion" to fight with the me at home and the German invaders. I talked them, and they invariably gave me as reasons for Bolsheviki chaos in Russia, first German propaga and money, and then the discontent of the Je element. They all said, "The Jews are ruining Ru systematically and they will go on until the Rus people themselves will shake off their appalling i rance and put the menace down. It began a cent ago when the Russian government realized the polit unrest existing among the Jews and their ruth method of economic exploitation of the vast coun They immediately put forth the most drastic ord such as closing the universities and military institu to all but about three per cent. of the Jewish elem They issued commands ordering the Jews to "m on," families not being allowed to remain for m than twenty-four hours in some towns. They co not carry on any important trading business in one pl more than six months, after which they had to "m on." In this way the Jewish nation in Russia, wh consisted of several millions, was reduced to a la less and homeless wandering and ever-moving mass miserable people.

This persecution has been dreadful and to be plored, but they are getting their revenge at last feeding the fires of lawless Bolshevism. They h nothing to lose by this upheaval and much to ga Since the reign of the Soviet government, lands a money have fallen into the hands of the Jews, w are able now to settle down and "move on" no mo So, of course, they are mostly the instigators a propagators of Bolshevism, because the chaotic con tion of the country and the lawlessness of the reigni class will give them what they have lost or are af

The seventeen million Russian soldiers who form the first bands of Bolshevists were ignorant and i capable of grasping either the real meaning of freedo or the Bolshevist interpretation of it. They had bee ground under heel. So when they had the power th did a little grinding on their own account. Th broke off all restraints and indulged in a period cruel and destructive drunkenness and debauche and crime. But now that they have seized the lan and the money, they have settled back and want more of Bolshevism. The peasants have also wrest from their "feudal" lords all their possessions an now wish to keep them. The disturbance now being feverishly carried on by a small group of intell gent Jews and pro-German Russian ultra-radical cialists. They are urging on the chaos and the t rorism of the Red reign, through a handful of hire Russian and savage Chinese "Reds."

THUS Bolshevism wishes to make gains unde cover of such great disturbance. But the mas of the Russian people have had enough of it. T Reds will pass, because the Moderates (scornful called "Pinks" by the Bolsheviki) have acquired prop strongholds there and will soon challenge the Reds.

Russia is beginning to move, slowly, as is her won because of her great size and clumsiness, but neverth less she has begun to throw off the heavy yoke of th false "freedom" brought or granted by Bolshevism and the coming years will find a Russia sadly ravage by her awful experiences, but a Russia that shall last have found herself and will be an aid to civilization instead of a great menace.

Most Miles per Dollar

—whether you count your money in tires, fuel or car mechanism—is the simple answer to every demand of those who own cars.

In the Firestone organization the idea of providing travel on rubber at lowest possible cost is a vital issue. Living up to this creed has sent the name Firestone around the world with the meaning, everywhere, of most miles per dollar.

90% of all Firestone workers own stock in the business. Thus thousands of them have this personal financial interest in giving the public road travel at low cost.

In this bigger cord tire with the new non-skid tread you find the finest expression of the Firestone creed—to deliver most miles per dollar.

IT doesn't cost a fortune to buy a Maxwell. Yet it is a sum to command a man's best judgment.

You can pay more and get less. You can pay $100, $200, $300—even $400 more and find no more luxury than you get in a Maxwell.

It has every modern improvement, every modern device of cars costing many hundred dollars more.

And if you pay less you will get less. Less room, for instance. Less comfort. Less power. Less wheel-base. Less ability. Less luxury.

In most things you buy, whether it be a hat, shoes, dining-room furniture, or a house, there is always a meeting ground between luxury and economy.

THE INVISIBLE TARIF

One of the Most Immediate of Our Post-War Financial Problems

BY FRANCIS H. SISSON

Vice-President of the Guaranty Trust Company of New York.

DESPITE the heavy financial burdens imposed by the war, America is confronted with an embarrassment of riches—at least so far as indebtedness to this country is concerned. And thoughtful business men throughout the country are beginning to realize that our position as the greatest creditor nation of the world has its serious disadvantages and responsibilities. We gradually are comprehending, also, that whether or not there shall be a formal organization of a League of Nations, we are bound to other peoples by innumerable and far stronger ties than those which any international covenant could impose.

There has, indeed, been no more convincing proof of this fact than that recently provided by the "unpegging" of, or withdrawing of governmental support from, sterling and franc exchange. The larger significance of what was seemingly only a financial operation is daily becoming more apparent. It marks in a dramatic fashion the shifting from a war to a peace basis, not alone in financing, but also in practically every economic phase of international relations. It is one of the most immediate, vital post-war financial problems, and concerns the importer and manufacturer of domestically consumed products as well as the exporter and manufacturer of goods which are sent abroad—for it creates an invisible tariff against American goods in England and France, which sooner or later, but inevitably, will affect our domestic trade. We are awakening to a realization that the prosperity of the country to-day depends upon increased production, and, consequently, that it behooves us to expand our foreign markets, instead of letting them contract.

Our Recent Trade Balance

It is true that during January and February of this year the value of our exports has exceeded the value of our imports in record-breaking amounts. The statistics recently issued by the Department of Commerce show that our exports during January exceeded those of any other month in the history of the country, aggregating in value approximately $623,000,000, which was $57,000,000 more than in December, and $118,000,000 in excess of January, 1918. In February of this year our exports were valued at $588,600,000.

These are decidedly encouraging figures, but we must not be misled by a superficial consideration of their significance, and forget what such unprecedented purchasing abroad of our products entails. We can not continue to ship such enormous quantities of goods overseas unless the buyers pay us for them. There are three ways in which they can settle their bills, namely, by means of goods or service, by gold, or by securities or other instruments of value.

If we are to increase our production, which, as I have pointed out, is necessary to the maintenance of our prosperity, we cannot take goods in full exchange for our products. Besides, we are nearer than any other people to economic independence, and do not need imports in anything like the quantities necessary to settle the trade balance in our favor.

We Do Not Want More Gold

Payment in gold is as impossible as it is undesirable. The value of the excess of our exports over our imports in January alone exceeded the total value of gold produced in all countries, except the United States, during 1918. In addition, we now hold more than one-third of the world's reserve of gold coin and bullion, having added about $1,500,000,000 to our store of the precious metal in the last four years. We could not with safety drain other nations of their remaining low stock of gold, if we would; for, as we are already their creditors to the extent of about $12,000,000,000, it is imperative for us to help them maintain their currency on as sound a foundation as is practicable under existing circumstances.

The granting of credits to purchasers of our goods will very materially aid in solving the immediate problems of financing foreign trade, but, at best, it can be only a temporary expedient. Credit, as you are well aware, is merely the giving of a present value in exchange for a promise to pay. It serves to postpone the payment of indebtedness to a more propitious time for the buyer or borrower, but it does not settle the account.

This expedient was necessarily resorted to on a colossal scale during the war, and England was able to weather so successfully the financial storm during the early stages of the conflict and to lend large sums of money to her less fortunate allies because she had extensive credits and investments scattered all over the world.

England's Invisible Exports

Before the war England had "invisible exports" amounting to approximately $1,800,000,000 a year, consisting chiefly of interest in foreign investments which totaled about $1,000,000,000. The toll from foreign freights carried in English ships netted her something like $800,000,000. So that while England apparently had an adverse trade balance in 1913 of $670,000,000, in reality she had a favorable balance to the extent of more than $1,100,000,000.

On the other hand, our favorable trade balance of $500,000,000 prior to the war was about equalized by our payment of interest and dividends abroad, freight rates, etc.

Then the war came, and Europe, plunged into the most destructive of conflicts, needed in vast quantities the products of our fields, factories and mines. American securities held abroad were sold back to us in wholesale quantities in order that munitions and supplies might be purchased with the proceeds; more than $2,000,000,000 was lent to foreign governments through private channels in this country, and subsequently, foreign governments floated large loans in our market.

When we entered the war, the financing of our Allies was naturally taken over by the government, which advanced credits to them to the extent of more than $9,000,000,000. There remains less than $1,000,000,000 of the fund appropriated by Congress for the purpose to be lent to our allies.

And it is to meet the situation created by this circumstance that the government is arranging to aid American export trade by advancing $1,000,000,000 through the War Finance Corporation. Without entering into consideration of the merits of this plan, it will readily be seen that it consists merely of the granting of credits for purchases here, and, therefore, can only be in the nature of an expedient, even though the credits extend over a period of five years. Furthermore, if the value of our exports continue to exceed the value of our imports at the present ratio, even $1,000,000,000 can not long be effective as a remedy.

While there has been no official statement issued by the British or French government as to the reasons for withdrawing their support from sterling and franc exchange, respectively, one result is inevitable, namely, the curtailment of the purchase of American goods in France and England. This is probably one of the two principal reasons for the so-called "unpegging" of these exchanges. The other reason was doubtless the high cost of supporting pounds and francs at the figures at which they had been held prior to the withdrawing of the government support.

The Invisible Tariff

Both England and France realize the danger of piling up huge indebtedness for our products on top of the pyramid of such obligations already existing. They are well aware that by permitting exchange to take its natural course, the American dollar must inevitably be at a premium, which means, of course, that less can be purchased in France and England by the dollar than heretofore, and, consequently, buying of American goods will be discouraged. As I have stated, an "invisible tariff" is thus created against our products. We cannot criticise England or France for taking this protective measure, particularly when we consider that the support of sterling exchange necessitated the purchase by British agents of between $3,000,000,000 and $4,000,000,000 worth of sterling in the American market during the period in which exchange was controlled by the British treasury.

As one English authority recently explained, England "had been bearing the burden of maintaining the relation of sterling to the dollar not only up to the day when the United States came into the war, but ever since. It has been very costly borrowing dollars daily or weekly at 5½ per cent. in New York to pay for all the sterling bills offered in London at $4.76 per pound.

"A point often arises in the relation of debtor and creditor when it is the creditor, and not the debtor, who is on the anxious seat," this same authority observed; and he added, "I think that this is the case now in our relation with the United States. At any rate, I am satisfied that it is quite as much the interest of the United States today to maintain the relation of dollar to sterling as it is ours to maintain the relation of sterling to dollar, and it is about time to leave the exchange to adjust itself."

It might have been advisable, however, to have cushioned the shock by a gradual readjustment, but that would not have altered the fact that so long as our dollar is at a premium this country will be a good one to sell in but a poor one to buy from—which is a vital element not only in the present exchange situation, but also in the whole problem of financing foreign trade.

The Solution

The solution seems to lie, as I have indicated, in the purchase here of foreign securities. We may as well understand now that we can n hope to recall all of our foreign lo and that, knowingly or otherwise, have invested abroad on a perma basis. There is no doubt about our ing to invest abroad some of the heavy interest on foreign loans.

But that should prove to be one of our grea assets, as it proved to be one of England's when unparalleled crisis of 1914 shook the foundatio civilization. It means also that we are in w affairs on a scale never dreamed of a few years ag and we are there to stay. Comprehending that tr we must take full advantage of it, not only fo own sake but likewise for that of our debtors. prosperity is now more than ever contingent upon prosperity of other nations. In helping them rehabilitate themselves we are helping ourselves. we are amply able to render the needed assistance the form of foreign investments.

We possess the greatest national resources of people on earth; our yearly income is greater than of any other nation; we lead the world in produ and commerce; we have the largest total of sa as well as the largest per capita savings—amount in 1919 to $113.45 a person, and to a grand total more than $10,800,000,000, which represents increase of more than $2,225,000,000 since 1914. amount of "free gold," that is to say, of excess serves, in the Federal Reserve System, which re sents the surplus lending power of the system, sufficient to support a reserve-note circulation more than $1,500,000,000—a significant index to reserve financial power.

But investment in foreign securities involves g responsibilities, particularly for the uninitia Realizing that part of this responsibility will fall u them, our leading banks, in anticipation of the ser which they will soon be called upon to render, now studying the foreign security problem with a to affording their customers the largest possible s of protection.

Government Cooperation Imperative

The utmost care must be exercised in determini what foreign securities shall be offered to the Amer public. We shall have imperative need for ex knowledge of all factors behind these securities. banks can be trusted to do their part in this new f but they cannot perform their function fully and pr erly unless they and our investors have the supp of our government.

Aside from the material security which will guar tee the repayment of capital and interest, there involved the question of property rights. Th rights must be protected by the United States go ernment. It is high time that a policy which wo afford such protection be formulated and put in practice—not perfunctorily but actively, and ea estly—so that our investors in foreign lands w be assured that, regardless of the Administration power at Washington, their property rights abro will be defended, if need be, scrupulously a sternly.

I do not view the future with alarm. I am co fident that we will solve the problems which ha grown out of the war as successfully as we met tho created by the crisis through which we have ju passed—provided our government stands behi business generally, instead of obstructing it. That one of the most important responsibilities of victo devolving upon the government.

The State Department must declare a fixed forei policy, a policy which will endure from Administratio to Administration. With Congress rests the r sponsibility of freeing business from the chains unfair and blighting restrictions—chains more dead than enemy bayonets.

When the responsibility imposed upon us by victo shall have been discharged, then, but not until the the United States will fulfil its manifest destiny a render the world-wide economic and practical human tarian service of which we are so abundantly capab and to which we aspire with the same splendid idea ism that led us into this greatest of all wars to make t world safe for democracy.

But our first and greatest responsibility is to mak democracy geniune for the world. And we can be accomplish that by establishing firmly the politic ideal in human relations which was dreamed of by th Fathers in founding a government under which n distinction of class, or section, or creed should ev prevail; which was created to foster a citizensh reflecting that fine type of Americanism that Theodor Roosevelt preached and lived; which was to mak possible a land of equal rights for all and of speci privileges for none; and which today should unite u into a people solemnly resolved that its sons who slee in Flanders Fields shall have not died in vain, tha liberty shall not be made a mockery, and that th hands of human progress shall not be turned backward.

REO

With Electric Starter and Lights, and on Pneumatic Tires This Reo "Speed Wagon" Was the Forerunner of Its Type

In 1915 when this Reo "Speed Wagon" was first introduced, those features—electric starter, electric lights and pneumatic tires—constituted a liability.

Today, they are its greatest asset.

Then, our dealers told us the one "sales resistance" was the reluctance of buyers to "experiment with pneumatics on a truck."

Now, those same dealers tell us it is mainly because of these features that this Reo enjoys such a tremendous popularity and demand.

Then, there were only a few Reo "Speed Wagons" in hands of a few daring owners.

Now, more than 20,000 in hands of the most conservative and critical class of customers.

Then, there was a fear of "punctures and blow-outs."

Now, those bugbears are forgotten in the light of the great proven efficiency and economy of this Reo.

Then, even the tire makers were skeptical of this Reo innovation.

Now, tire makers, without exception, advocate pneumatics for trucks not only of this type, but up to five tons and over.

Then, the average buyer considered an electric starter a non-essential and electric lights superfluous.

Now, he would as soon buy a "street starting" automobile with kerosene lamps, as a motor truck of that obsolete type.

Then, only the Reo engineers appreciated the superiority—the greater efficiency, speed, economy and lower upkeep—of a truck mounted on pneumatics.

Now, rival engineers are copying this Reo as closely as they can.

Then, only drivers knew the saving of time and fuel and motor wear effected by the electric starter.

Now, the owner knows even better—through his cost accountant.

Nor need we now show how the working day is lengthened and the radius increased by the electric lighting system—for that, too, is patent.

Again, is Reo "conservative progressiveness" justified.

Again, is the leadership of Reo shown—and by imitation, that sincerest form of flattery—is the leadership of Reo design and the soundness of Reo engineering proven.

Now, you will have to be equally farsighted to get one—for demand is almost hopelessly in excess of the possible factory output.

Only way is to see your Reo dealer and order now—at once.

If you delay you may have to accept an imitation in lieu of the original—a substitute instead of a Reo.

Today, won't be a minute too soon.

Why Do 9 Million Americans Get Shaved by Barbers?

There must be a reason. We think it is because the barber always uses a blade that is "just off the strop."

A razor that has not been stropped before it is used is not actually sharp. A razor that is not sharp never shaves you satisfactorily.

Barbers universally use a type of razor that can be stropped again and again.

They must be sure of a keen edge for each shave.

The type they use is like the GENCO razor shown here.

Why?

Have you ever stropped a blade scientifically designed to strop? Note how these blades meet the strop.

Because to strop perfectly, a razor needs a broad, firm back; it must be hollow ground, and there must be a supporting bevel just back of the thin, fine edge. A blade built in this way—as all GENCO blades are—touches the strop at just the correct angle to make sure of a perfect shaving edge.

Anybody Can Strop a Genco Razor

For men slightly timid about shaving with an unguarded blade, we make the Safege—a GENCO professional razor with a guard. Call on the nearest dealer, examine the Safege, and test the famous GENCO edge. GENCO Razors, you can keep sharp and they give you always a quick, smooth businesslike shave.

Hid, Yet Not Separate

SUNDAY. Ps. 104:29. "Thou hidest thy face." Matt. 28:20. "I am with you all the days." A thing can be veiled and yet be present. The mist can be over my garden and yet the rose trees are there and the roses are in bloom. The shroud that hides them does not remove them. The mountain that faces my house door can be blotted out of sight, and yet it is there in the encompassing gloom as it is there in the cloudless noon. And the presence of the Lord is sometimes veiled, but the veil does not divide, it only conceals. There is no gulf between us, it is only that our customary perceptions have failed in a deeper discernment.

Now, it may be that God hides his face in order to set us seeking. He has other treasures which he wants to show us and to share with us, but we have not acquired the necessary powers of apprehension. And so our discernments must be disciplined and refined before we can receive the bounty. The Lord hides his face in order that we may exercise our eyes in looking, and we thereby come into possession of finer sight. It is the hidden problem which awakes our faculties to keener vigilance. If everything were simplified, growth would be arrested. Vision would remain stationary. It is the challenge of the hidden thing that discovers our resources. In finding solutions to problems we also find ourselves. The act of seeking gives us better eyes. And so it is that the veiled presence of the Lord lures us into a discipline in which our souls are enlarged. "Seek ye Me and ye shall live!" Yes, and larger life begins in the seeking. "To them that seek thee thou art good?" God's hiding is a holy love-ministry in the education of his children. Therefore let not your heart be troubled! The veil will prove to be a minister of revelation.

But a hidden God does not mean a God who has gone away. His gracious veils are not the ministers of separation. Nothing can separate us from the Lord but our unrepented sin. Sin always alienates. Sin is ever a minister of division. Sin is a trespass, a vagrancy, and in all sin I am wandering away from the Lord. It is sin which makes the great gulf. But when I humbly repent of my sin, the beginnings of repentance mark the end of alienation. "This my son was lost and is found!" Yes, the spiritual distance is swallowed up. "Ye that were far off are made nigh in the blood of Christ."

And so it is that God hides and we separate. The hiding is born of love, the separation is born of sin. The veil is the love-device of a fuller revelation, the separation is the obstinate revolt of a sinful will. In God's darkness we can grow. In the darkness of sin we shrivel into death. J. H. J.

The "All Things"

MONDAY. Rom. 8:28. "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them that are the called according to his purpose." In the verses immediately preceding the apostle Paul has been speaking of the fulness of redemption that awaits the believer in the future, but here he speaks of the fulness of the present privilege of the believer. It is the believer's present privilege to know that all things that come to him, or that can possibly come to him, will work together for his highest good. These words, if they sink into our heart and are kept in mind, will forever banish all possibility of anxiety and worry. "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God." If this is true, how can we ever worry? How can we ever have an anxious thought?. Whatever comes to me must be part of the "all things," and instead of fretting over it or rebelling

Confidence in God and Self

THURSDAY. Isa. 30:15. "In quietness and confidence shall be your rength." Faith in God, quiet trust, solute confidence makes for strength do our work and live our life where od has placed us. God ordains and ules. He guides, directs, and we are submit to his will and purpose. The dividual counts one in the scheme of ings.

Though but a single strand, he is a art of the warp and woof of the infinite apestry on the loom of Omnipotence. e is important, necessary, for the com- letion of the design. The diagram and lue print is in God's hand.

To change the figure, the individual lays an instrument in the symphony of ife. All the instruments are different. ome are small and some are large. We hink there are different degrees of onor in the orchestra, but the instruments differ only in kind, not in the degree of service. The thing for us all to do is to play the score the Great Composer has placed before us, and to play t well. At least we are to follow the otes to the best of our ability. To refuse to play our part as it is written will ause discord. To ask the reason for his or that will hinder the perfect rendition. To interpret the music with our wn knowledge will break the harmony. Every man's place and part is an essential to the whole. Obedience is the watchword. Consecration to the will of God is the motive. A rich melody will be the result. There is no dimension in Christian service. We are to do our best, our part, high or low, the first violin or the kettle-drum. The individual is a unit and integral of the many. God is the Leader. He beats the time. Confidence in his wisdom makes life a Hallelujah Chorus. R. B.

The Key to History

FRIDAY. Luke 11:52. "Woe unto you, lawyers! for ye have taken away the key of knowledge: ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered." These are the closing words of the Lord's severe arraignment of the religious leaders of his people. They represent the climax of his address. It is not easy to imagine a worse charge that can be raised against a teacher than this, that he has taken away the key of knowledge from his pupils. The lawyers were the theologians of the church. It was their duty to make the people understand the Scriptures. Now, the Scriptures testify of Christ. Understand Christ, and you understand Holy Writ from Genesis to Revelation. Christ, the God-man, the Redeemer, unlocks the meaning of God's Book: he is the complement of all the ancient prophecies, the antitype of all the types in the Jewish worship, the substance corresponding to all the shadows by which Israel's priests and prophets had silhouetted him and his atoning work to the people, the expounder of the law in all its sternness, and of the Gospel with all its reviving power and comfort. He is the key of knowledge. But how had the lawyers taken this key away? By their hostile attitude to Christ. Their great influence upon the masses was used to deter the people from Christ. They cast suspicion upon his evangelical teaching and stooped to vile insinuations to explain his miraculous powers. They picked quarrels with Christ, often on silly questions of casuistry, and tried to entrap Christ by sly questionings. Immediately after this discourse, Luke relates, they stormed at Christ in a furious manner. They denounced people who had conceived a good opinion of Christ as ignorant persons, and even excommunicated men for professing faith in him. Thus they debarred people who were on the point of coming to Christ, and by their unhappy disposition shut themselves out from all possibility of judging Christ fairly and appreciating his work. Taking away the key of knowledge—that has been the typical sin of false religious leaders in all ages. W. H. T. D.

Spiritual Satisfaction

SATURDAY. Ps. 17:15. "I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness." Created in the divine image, it will be fully restored when we see Him as he is and are glorified together. The joy of Jesus is a satisfying portion the moment we believe in him, but, in the wider realm and larger capacities of the future, we shall become more gloriously satisfied with the brimming cup of delight in his presence. In this life we know not what we shall be sufficiently to describe heavenly happiness. A little girl trying to draw a picture of a brilliant sunset exclaimed to her teacher, "I can't draw glory." It is the province of the Infinite Artist to create glory but not to reveal its full splendor to his children on earth. When we see and know, we shall be fully satisfied.

How many seek soul satisfaction in material things, vanishing delights, forgetting to quaff the spiritual elixir flowing from the heart of Christ! We search for the philosopher's stone that will turn everything into gold, finding only yellow dust at last.

Christianity is the opposite principle and seeks to turn gold into everything beautiful, useful and needful. How more and more satisfied one becomes who lives the sacrificial life of love, kindness and benevolence for lost and suffering humanity! E. W. C.

The Grace of God

International Sunday School Lesson for May 18
II Cor. 12:9, Eph. 2:4-10 and Titus 2:11-14

The Nature and Source of Our Salvation

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE grace of God—what a theme it is! Proclaimed by the apostles, testified unto by the martyrs, sung by the poets and composers, manifested by the church in every age and every clime! Shall we venture to attempt to define it? Let each member of our class try to put into some form of expression the meaning conveyed to him by this beautiful word. Perhaps this definition may be offered: "The grace of God is his whole-souled goodness toward his undeserving creatures." The Old Testament has a tender word which stands for the same thing, which is translated in our language lovingkindness. You'll remember the line of a hymn, using it where we have another definition of the grace of God—"his lovingkindness, oh, how free!"

Out of this unmerited goodwill of the Father flows blessing, rebuke, daily care, redemption in all its fulness, and keeping power. "All things are of God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ." When we wish to study the grace of God we turn to the writings of St. Paul, for grace was his master-word, and you could list a whole page of illuminating references to it in his letters and speeches illustrating from his own experience "the exceeding riches of His grace." The reading lesson given us from the Ephesian letter is compact of power and should be memorized by all of us, beginning: "But God, being rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead through our trespasses, made us alive together with Christ, and raised us up with him, and made us to sit with him in the heavenly places, in Christ Jesus."

Grace Abounding to Sinners

The great enemy of grace is sin, and over every human soul their contest is being fought out daily. Paul in his letter to the Romans has described this conflict in memorable terms, both in the fifth and in the seventh chapters; but he was confident that God's grace is greater than even human sinfulness. "Where sin abounded, grace did abound more exceedingly." It is our blindness and folly in forgetting to avail ourselves of the help God is seeking so faithfully to impart that we make so many failures in the Christian life. In the midst of our temptations and the troubles which are equally discouraging to the disciple, the listening soul will hear the gentle assurance Paul heard: "My grace is sufficient for thee."

The truly successful Christians all testify like Paul himself when he said: "By the grace of God I am what I am." He knew his weaknesses, his faults of temper and disposition. He never forgot his early Pharisaism and his persecution of the Church. He had dreadful tribulations and persistent opposition, not only from the pagans and the Jews, but from "false brethren" who misrepresented him and nearly broke his heart by their malignity. He had his "thorn in the flesh." Yet never lived a more glorious example of the grace of God not being received in vain. Such another was John Newton, who remarked feelingly of the miserable wreck of a man who staggered by: "There, but for the grace of God, goes John Newton." Surely you have noted the same testimony still from every true saint of God whom you know—not different from us in temptations or human weakness, but more appreciative of the abounding grace of God which transforms their lives and hearts.

The Means of Grace

How then are we to realize more fully on the infinite assets which are ours? In old-fashioned phrase, by attendance on "the means of grace." What was it that our fathers meant by this use of words in their Christian testimony? Here is a helpful and suggestive tion: "The means of grace are th ward influences by which God's tion in Christ is brought to bear the lives of men for their salva They are not to be limited any than the grace of God itself. A th ful book, an inspired picture, a hour of conference with a true di a terrific experience on the battl may be the means by which the gr God is manifested unto men. But usually the book is the Bible, the f ship that of the Church, the pictu baptism of a believer or a reveren ticipation in the Lord's Supper. earliest means of grace was the word of testimony, as in the bo Acts, before the New Testament yet written, where we find the ples "speaking boldly in the Lord bare witness unto the word o grace." Preaching and teaching fundamental in the Great Commi and the churches which have pu emphasis upon the sermon and the day school have been able to prod superior type of Christian life to which have tried to reduce the m of grace to set forms and ceremonie

Yet these too are not without efficacy, else they would not have established by the Holy Spirit. I been borne in upon me with great viction that in our church the reve and thoughtful participation of the gregation in a carefully planned c munion service has had values not fo in the ordinary sermon or pra meeting. We also know that man us have been strengthened in spirit witnessing the ordinance of baptis for as we listened to young men young women pledging "I believe in Lord Jesus Christ as my Saviour a dedicate my life to the service of Kingdom" we were deeply moved made a reconsecration of our lives o selves. It is not for the best that s among us are impatient of the sa ments and that a majority of the m bers of most churches are neglectful the Lord's Table. For these are the outward and visible signs of an ward and spiritual grace.

The difference between various sta of Christian life is largely due to a grea or less devotion to prayer, to the " sembling of ourselves together," to reverent study of the Bible, and practice of Christian effort day by da God is seeking to give, but his serva are not always wise enough to take.

Stewards of God's Grace

In the First Epistle of Peter there another emphasis given to this wh matter of the grace of God, namely, th we are to be "good stewards of the ma ifold grace of God." Very largely deed doth he give his grace to oth through his servants. Blessed are th who are the channels of the divine gra to others, for they shall in no wise mi its power themselves. Jesus recogniz the fact that his disciples have the pow of loosing or binding the spirits of me (John 20:23). We know that God grace has been given us through Pa and John, through our fathers an mothers, through our Sunday scho teachers and our ministers. Upon u then, is laid an obligation to minister h grace in like manner to others. You ar perhaps, discouraged with your Sunda school work, but you may be the onl direct purposeful manifestation of th grace of God vouchsafed unto some bo or girl in this whole week to come. Ho greatly they need the "grace of Go which was given unto you"! You word of friendship to some disheartene one may be as the voice of Jesus Chris to your neighbor. "Handshaking is means of grace," says some one. Le your cordial fellowship draw peopl nearer to your Father.

"He will give grace—and glory!" Those who know best the marvels o his grace here below will be prepared most fully to appreciate "the glory tha shall be revealed to usward."

Interesting Sundays

3y CHARLES M. SHELDON

"WHAT do you do for your children on Sundays?" asked one woman of another. Both lived in a col- town.

Come over to my house next Sun- and see," was the answer. "And your children."

warn you they are very restless and ppy unless they can play outdoors. ve come to dread Sundays, because children want to get out into the ts and disturb the neighbors."

You won't have any trouble with 1," the other woman said with a confidence.

ext Sunday there were two mothers five children together in a small 1. It was a rainy day. All the bet- said the mother who did not know t to do with her children on such as they raged over the house in ess, fretful confusion.

n a table in the middle of the room a high-power microscope, and under lens a glass slide. The seven people down around this table, and there the most intense look of expecta- and eagerness on the faces of the lren of the mother who had invited er neighbor.

You take the first look, neighbor." he "neighbor" looked, and almost amed with delight. "What do you them?"

Vorticella."

They are wonderful! Where do you them?"

In any mud puddle. But wait."

he mother who had invited the hbor went to the windows and led down the shades and in addition w heavy curtains over to meet, mak- the room dark. She then set out a jecting lantern on the table, attached electric light, put the vorticella slide he lantern and turned the light on pace of white wall.

n a moment it was luminous with the st wonderful waving creatures like ng glass bells swaying on silver eads. The children shouted with de- it. The neighbor was astounded at sight of a beauty she had never amed of as existing in "any mud ldle."

The afternoon passed in a study of of God's most remarkable creations, thers and children absorbed in what y learned.

'But I can't afford to buy a high- wer microscope," said the neighbor.

'You don't have to with the college r by willing to loan its instruments people in the extension courses."

'But I don't know anything about se creatures."

"There are plenty of books to tell you out them."

"But the lantern, and all that?"

"The college was glad to loan it to . They do not use it on Sundays. hy not spend a part of our Sundays owing our children the wonderful rks of God?"

Indeed, why not?

The Cheerful Dining-Room

PHYSICIANS tell us that cheerfulness is absolutely necessary to good gestion, and because of this fact the terior decorator's ideal of a dining- om is a room in which cheer is strongly ggested in furnishings and decoration.

The clever housekeeper becomes her n interior decorator and studies her ning-room with a critical eye to de- rmine whether or not it is as bright d cheery as it could possibly be.

Mrs. A., after a critical survey of this rt, decides that all her dining-room eds is a vivid window-box, red with raniums or yellow with nasturtiums, pon which the eyes of her family may st while at table.

Mrs. B., however, discovers that her all-paper is too somber in color; for r dining-room faces north, and the ck of sunshine should be atoned for y a rich cream-color wall-paper.

The change which Mrs. C. will make of an entirely different character: she will substitute flowered chintz valances for the dark green over-curtains at the windows.

But Mrs. D. finds that her dining-room is as cheerful as she can make it, except that it might be improved, possibly, by a canary-bird cage hung in the sunshine of the bay-window.

A cheerful dining-room is not only conducive to good digestion, but is also responsible for many "good days" in one's life; for a day well started is not apt to go wrong—and a pleasant breakfast room has much to do with the start of a day. L. A. K.

When the Seamstress Comes

By LAURA A. KIRKMAN

ALL housekeepers agree that the day on which the seamstress comes to help with the sewing is the busiest of all days. For not only must the housekeeper prepare a midday meal for the seamstress, but she must also supervise the dressmaking and work with the seamstress, doing the small things which anybody can do, in order that the helper's professional skill need not be wasted on the simple tasks of the needle.

The housekeeper's problem, then, on such a day, is this: to give the seamstress a nourishing midday meal, and yet a meal which will require the minimum of time to prepare.

The following menu will be a help to a woman at such a time. Its merit lies in the fact that it contains only one dish which cannot be prepared on a previous day—scalloped corn. (The baked potatoes will of course have to go into the oven, too.)

Veal Loaf
Scalloped Corn Baked Potatoes
Brown Bread
Tea Apple Custard Pie

Veal Loaf: Three pounds veal, half pound salt pork, one cup fine bread crumbs, two eggs, butter size of a walnut. Chop veal and pork together, add bread crumbs, then egg well beaten. Salt and pepper to taste, add butter, melted, form into a loaf and bake, basting often.

Scalloped Corn: Turn one can of corn out into a baking-dish, add half cup of milk or cream, one beaten egg, one teaspoon salt, a little pepper. Cover with bread crumbs. Bake in a moderate oven fifteen minutes.

Brown Bread: One teaspoon soda in one and one-half teacups of molasses. Stir until it foams. Add one pint sweet milk, four cups Graham flour, one cup wheat flour, one teaspoon salt, two teaspoons baking powder. Bake one and one-half hours in a slow oven. Cover the pans while baking. This will make two loaves of bread.

Apple Custard Pie: Mix a cup of sour apple sauce with half cup of sugar, one egg and the yolk of one more, and one cup of milk. Bake with one crust and spread with the beaten white.

Renovating Millinery

HOW to make a new hat blossom where only an old hat hung before is a subject which is interesting many women these days.

Black straw hats may be cleaned with alcohol and water and some of the commercial coloring substances used to restore color and luster. White straw hats may be cleaned with a solution of one teaspoonful of oxalic acid to a pint of cold water, or by suspending the hat, after it has been thoroughly wet, in a barrel at the bottom of which sulphur is burned in a tin dish.

Black satin ribbons may be renovated by laying them on a board and sponging with ammonia and water or alcohol and water. They should then be pressed while damp, after they have been covered with a piece of tissue-paper.

Suggestions

Having learned how to be thrifty, who wants to be wasteful?

Clothes should not only be becoming, but they should suit the occasion and the wearer's circumstances.

Ask When You See White Teeth

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

Ask How the Film Was Ended

A large percentage of well-advised people now use a new method of teeth cleaning. It shows in their glistening teeth. When your friends show pearly teeth, ask them what they do.

Time has proved to millions that the tooth brush is inadequate. Teeth still discolor, still decay, tartar forms and pyorrhea starts. Statistics show that tooth troubles have constantly increased.

Dentists know the reason. It lies in a film—that slimy film which you feel with your tongue. It clings to the teeth, gets into crevices, hardens and stays. And most tooth troubles are now known to be due to it.

That film is what discolors, not your teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Also of many other serious diseases.

Now a vast number of people, twice a day, use a method to combat that film. It is a scientific discovery. Able authorities have long proved its efficiency, and leading dentists all over America are urging their patients to use it.

That method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. You will find it used on every hand today. And you can learn the reason, without cost, by a pleasant ten-day test.

Watch Your Teeth Whiten

Try this new way at our cost and watch your teeth whiten. Learn what really clean teeth mean. That's the only way to beauty and to safety in your teeth.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly combat it.

Pepsin long seemed impossible. It must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But dental science has discovered a harmless activating method. Patents have been granted by five governments already. It is that method, used in Pepsodent, which brings this new era in teeth cleaning.

You owe to yourself and to your children a test of this new-day method. It is the surest and easiest way to protect your teeth.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Use it like any tooth paste. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the slimy film. See how your teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

That is probably what your white-teeth friends have done. You will want such white teeth, clean and safe teeth always when you know.

Cut out the coupon now.

Life the School of God, and Its Lessons

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Psalm 119 : 1–8 : 35–40

A MAN may quit the public school; he cannot avoid the school of life. But life is only a preparatory school; it fits us for eternity. In it we learn to know God, to trust him and to serve him. First we learn to talk with God. In prayer we meet him face to face. Then we learn to walk with God. His spirit leads us in ways of righteousness. Then we learn to work with God. His love impels us to kindness, helpfulness, unselfishness, and in these we find opportunity to express God to others in terms of deeds. Then we learn to commune with God, and in quiet hours or amid the turmoil of the day we reach out in heart and mind toward God and feel his strength surge through us, quickening our pulses and sweetening our labor. And thus we come to be prepared to be with God when this course of preparation is ended and time is enfolded in eternity.

But as in the common school, so in this school of life we must take the course. It serves no purpose of achievement to fail in patience. Ambition is well, but impatient haste only delays. And we must not think too highly of ourselves. Humility, backed by evident worth, wins the ultimate reward, but noisy pretense and assumed ability are soon exposed. Nor can we reach the goal by any by-path. There is one entrance to the school of God's children, Jesus Christ, and one course, the Scriptures and God's daily leading. God's lessons also include sorrow; through this he leads us to his deepest joys;

A Woman's Idea of Church Unity

WHEN I received your paper of January 22, the first thing that attracted my attention was the "Sermon to Preachers." You say with truth that what the Church needs is not a new program, not a new message, but a return to the simplicity of apostolic days. I am sure our ministers have the message. We are at the parting of the ways, one of which may lead to greater exclusiveness, while the other discloses the broadening power of God's love. The Church must take the broader way. I do not believe the people in the Church realize their exclusiveness. At heart they mean to serve God, but they have not seen the way, because their experiences have not shown them.

We know that social barriers have been leveled to a great extent in France. We hear about the washerwoman's son being a comrade of the millionaire's son. Chaplain Ridout has not screened this unity of feeling that has been engendered. The millionaire's son finds in the trenches the consolation of the human touch. He feels the brotherhood of man. It is not a question of denomination. Get together in a unity of brotherhood, and the question of denomination will settle itself.

I believe in every one's heart is born the wish to "belong." No matter how far they have fallen, they will respond to genuine friendly interest; but if you only have toleration to offer, self-respect and pride hold them back. If the Church of God is to be democratized, it must welcome the people in the spirit of friendship. We as Christians must unbend. A few leaders can't do it for us. Unity to serve God through the Protestant Church is the answer.

We cannot separate the Church and the war. Our times are fraught with greatest meaning to the Church. Combining both in the presentation of the Gospel would not be having "two nozzles to your hose." But let the preacher be a preacher and let politics alone. Those who are so ready to recur to law are those who generally break the law. And the people know it. So, Mr. Preacher, don't attempt to be the justice of the peace in your community. Just preach Christ and the things that pertain to him.

Among the people, denomination is about lost already. Toleration is springing up in Church circles. We are drawn closer to each other than before, through our boys having gon war.

Wanted—a League of Laymen!

By MILFORD H. LYON

President,, Interdenominational Association of Evangelists

TO BE with our soldiers in France and America for eighteen months has been my privilege. I believe I have learned a little eir thoughts and sensed something eir spirit. The great majority of are coming home bigger, broader better men than when they went . But their future will be largely mined by their environment when reenter civilian life.

e war has extended the horizon of verage man. This is true not only nally but also religiously. Few ers henceforth can regard any one mination as the only source and nent of spiritual truth. They ot consistently fight autocracy in rnment and then uphold it in re- n. As they have mingled with y type of Christian believers they noted how many were the points greement and how few and insignifi- the points of difference.

hey have had clearly exemplified fatality of selfishness. They have how a nation and its rulers, caring for their own interests, reap the strous harvest of their folly. If you inate the motive of selfishness and ly no substitute, inertia and stag- on must ensue. There are only bases for life, the self basis and the ist basis. The one is building on sand; the other on the rock.

his national tragedy has demon- ted likewise the insufficiency of in- ectualism. The German people had cated the head and the hand, but the heart. Culture is efficient, but sufficient. Spiritual birth must cede spiritual growth. Evolution not take the place of evangelism, nor ication of conversion.

he war has revealed also the joy of vice, the attractiveness of suffering, the immense latent possibilities in average life.

t has been the hard and dangerous lertakings that have appealed most esistibly to the men in the service. ny preachers in their desire for con- rts have made the serious mistake of rtraying merely the pleasant phases religion. The strongest appeal is to heroic. The most attractive call to come and suffer. Moreover, in the ny a constant source of amazement s been the achievements of some of most unpromising lives. It seemed ey awaited only the dynamic of a eat incentive and a great occasion to complish the impossible.

Now, what is all this to signify to the ristian thinker and worker? For one ing it must mean that these men, ming back from the camps and battle- lds, are not going to be content with ivialities. We must present to them a an and program big enough not only supply the need but also to arouse e militant spirit and to challenge the roic. No one church or denomination boring alone can meet the issue. ivision spells defeat. In a united hristendom alone is victory. God rbid that Christian people shall have wait, as did the Allies in the early onths of 1918, for disaster to stare em in the face before they are willing put aside the pride of prestige and nite under a common leadership for an ssured triumph.

Any comprehensive religious program ust include three factors—church fficiency, social reform, and world vangelization. I am not sure but that ur church architecture must undergo a adical alteration. In our homes the ld-fashioned parlor and spare bed- oom, closed except on special occa- ions, have had to go, and the whole ouse has been opened for family use. o church buildings, open every day and vening in the week, arranged for cheer nd comfort and hospitality, ought to ake the place of four bare walls somber with funereal gloom, closed except a few scant hours a week. Now the numerous adjacent churches, fostering rivalry and sectarian differences with preachers duplicating each other's work, ought to be replaced by unified churches located geographically instead of denominationally, like schoolhouses—where they are most needed and can best accommodate the population. Give the pastor a corps of paid assistants such as a musical director, a home visitor, a factory helper, a children's worker, all specialists, all ministers, with perhaps only one of the party a preacher, yet all doing a work vital and essential to the highest efficiency.

Likewise it ought to be the Christian forces that should assume and maintain the leadership in all phases of social service. A sure preventive and cure of Bolshevism is the Gospel of Christ applied to everyday life. The enforcement of law, the election of worthy legislators and executives, the enactment of right legislation, the applying of the remedy for injustice, fall rightfully and naturally among the duties and responsibilities of Christian people. We must not be content until every individual has a chance to develop his fullest capabilities.

Furthermore, there ought to be the preparation and consummation of a comprehensive and practical plan for world evangelization. The problem, whether home or foreign, is essentially the same. The ultimate is to get human lives into definite, personal, vital relationship with Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord. In this is the only satisfactory antidote for war. In no other way can any League of Nations be made permanent, operative, and effective. Human brotherhood must come not so much by legislation as by regeneration.

You ask, what practical method have you to propose to bring about these desired results? I believe the best way to begin is to get the Christian men of every city and community organized and united. A League of Laymen would be second only to a League of Nations in its value to civilization. Almost every great movement has worked up from below rather than down from above. That is, it has started with the people rather than with the officials.

I would suggest the organization of a Laymen's League in every city and village in America, with a branch in each church, each League to have three definite departments of work—a devotional, an evangelistic, and a civic. Let the first department aim to get a family altar erected in every home, to get every man interested in some line of Bible study, to strengthen the Sunday evening and the mid-week services. Let the second department organize Gospel teams for the work of personal evangelism. Let these go out into the suburban and rural districts as well as into the crowded city centers. Let this department plan for union evangelistic campaigns with comprehensive methods of preparatory and follow-up work. Let them also form a great program for missions, both home and foreign, and in this way the Laymen's Missionary Movement would prove the forerunner of the broader work of the Laymen's Leagues.

Then, the third department, the civic, should undertake the responsibility of seeing that laws, such as the new Eighteenth Amendment, are properly enforced. Nothing less than the organized, united moral and Christian sentiment of America can accomplish this. Churchmen must interest themselves in all phases of social reform and justice—such as sanitation, proper housing, child labor, factory inspection, and work for the unemployed.

Such a program is big enough and broad enough to attract the attention and utilize the talents of every type of men. It will appeal to the returning soldiers, who have been accustomed to attempting and accomplishing great undertakings. The secret of awakening interest in the church is to set every man to work. In service we shall find Unity.

Let us become heralds of a new crusade. In conquering sin, establishing justice, saving humanity, uniting believers and enthroning Christ, we shall realize the spiritual equivalent of war.

How the Jewish Nation Will Bless the World

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.,

Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

THE Zionist Convention held at Pittsburg last summer put forth a most significant declaration. It said that the dream of the Palestine Jews for the establishment of a United States of the Near East, while based on the principles of the United States of America, included a plan to have "laws relative to divorce, parent and child, inheritance, occupancy of land, etc., based upon the old Hebrew legislation." The ancient Jewish law of equality and justice to all would be made the guiding principle of the new life in Zion. "The purpose of the Zionists was not alone to reestablish the ancient homeland, but to build up a model commonwealth in which extremes of both riches and poverty should be averted, and the old-time Hebraic morality and justice become the law of the land."

The readers of the Christian Herald are asked to consider the interesting bearing of this on what was said, in an earlier article of our series on Prophecy, as to the divine purpose in the choice of Israel. It was stated that God chose Israel as a secondary instrument in the redemption of the human race on the earth for three reasons, one of which was that it might be a national witness to him before the other nations. Through its witness to his unity and supremacy, and his attributes of holiness and truth, and love and mercy, and wisdom and power, the other nations would be brought into obedience to him with blessing following. It was the unfaithfulness of Israel as a witness to him that led to its dispersion and suffering among the nations, and that explained also the continued alienation of those nations from him as illustrated in the war.

Furthermore, it was shown to be the teaching of the prophets that Israel would be restored to Palestine some day, though at first in unbelief as to Jesus being the Christ, and that later on, when converted, it would renew its allegiance and testimony to Jehovah, with the result foretold, the conversion of the nations to him.

BUT nothing was said as to the method by which that testimony would be expressed. Some might have asked whether the converted Jewish nation would send out missionaries through the earth to testify to Jehovah after the manner of Christian missionaries today, and such a thought is not to be excluded. But the declaration of the Zionist convention sets before us another very practical way in which that testimony will be borne, namely, by the life and conduct of the nation itself in its own land. By its constitution and laws, so to speak, by its administration of government, its system of commerce, education and religion, by its social regulations and everything that goes to make up a righteous and happy, peaceful and prosperous condition of society.

In other words, the Jewish nation in that day will show a reversion to type. It will be the Jewish nation at its best in the days of David and Solomon; nay, more, it will be the Jewish nation as God desired it to be in the days of David and Solomon. It will be the nation knowing and honoring the Mosaic law, living up to it in principle without reserve, and exhibiting its blessed effects to the emulation of the whole earth.

The world is very ignorant of Pentateuchal legislation, and the church in these days of destructive criticism has done little or nothing to enlighten it, little or nothing to increase its respect for and appreciation of the wisdom and potential value of that legislation. Henry George in his epochal work, "Progress and Poverty," based his principle of the single tax upon it, and many of his readers thought it a new thing and a startling innovation. Certain socialistic writers of the better class have steadily gone back to it for suggestion and inspiration, and the church, instead of aiding them to see it in its right light and to expound it in its entirety as a divine revelation, has sometimes attacked them as enemies of mankind.

OF COURSE the Ten Commandments are the basis of that legislation, just as the Constitution of the United States is the basis of all the legislation of our nation. But it is when we pass from the Decalogue itself to the chapters following it in Exodus, Leviticus and the other books that we behold the beauty of its principles in its inspired application to daily life.

Men now scoff at the observance of one day of rest in seven, because the Sabbath law of rest from labor comes in conflict with their love of gain and their haste to become rich. But imagine a time when a whole nation shall keep the Sabbath and demonstrate its practical value in all that contributes to the health and happiness and prosperity of all classes of the community.

Again, nothing more fundamentally concerns the well-being of society than the relation of the man and the woman in the constitution of the family. Behold, then, a nation in whose family life all license and impurity has become impossible through the operation of ideas which make that family a very sanctuary of holiness in the world.

The interests of one's neighbor and the care of the poor—how they will be provided for in that day, and what an example it will set to the other nations! The laborer in the harvest field will be God's steward and be bound to apply the product of the land as it shall please Him. He will leave the corners of the field for those who have no field of their own to reap, and he will not gather every grape of the vineyard, but leave some for the poor and the stranger.

There will be no stealing and no defrauding in that nation, neither will there be any lying or false swearing; guile and fraud, oppression and violence will be unknown. "Thou shalt not curse the deaf, nor put a stumbling-block before the blind." "Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honor the person of the mighty." "Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin shall ye have." (Lev. 19).

NOTHING contributes more to the welfare of a nation than its regulations as to hygiene and sanitation, hence the Levitical laws as to the clean and the unclean in personal habits, in the care of dwellings and their surroundings, and especially in the matter of food (Lev. 11).

Hebrews have always shown evidence of a marked immunity from sickness, and especially diseases of an infectious character. Their longevity also is superior to that of the Gentiles. Think, then, of what it will be when the nation is living in its own land in cheerful obedience to God in these things, and when the rest of the world shall have an opportunity to study the object lesson it presents and the disposition to profit by it!

This will be the day when Israel's prophecy shall be fulfilled: "God shall bless us, and all the ends of the earth shall fear Him" (Ps. 67 : 7).

At the risk of monotonous repetition, let it be clearly understood that although Jews are now in Palestine, and in greater numbers than for many generations, yet this is not what the prophets mean in foretelling their restoration.

Also, when peace has been finally reached, and they return in greater numbers still; and if Great Britain should succeed in establishing a semi-independent state in Palestine, neither would that be the fulfilling of the prophets. The moral restoration of the Jews must precede their national restoration in the divine sense. This means repentance for sin and conversion to Christ. And this, in turn, means antecedent tribulation such as that nation has never known.

FLOOD OF RETURNING EXILES

IT SEEMS to be a well-understood truth that none of the nations in what we call the Near East is capable of ruling peoples of other nationalities. Just as the Turks have driven out the Greeks and Armenians, in order that Turkey may be for the Turks, so other nations in this area have exiled foreigners. None of them can conceive of a method of assimilation by which, as in America, people from all lands become Americans, so in Rumania, for example, they might become Rumanians. Of course, the difference in religions has much to do with this condition of affairs, but that is another story.

Everybody knows, at least in part, the story of the way in which the Turks sought to rid their country of the Greeks and Armenians. Now the time has come when the exiles are returning, and those who lived in the neighborhood of Constantinople, or whose pathway home leads through that city, are gathering here in large numbers. The homes they are seeking will be sorry places when they find them, for the Turks took possession of their vacated houses, and four years of Turkish tenancy does not improve the value of real estate.

A committee of Greeks has been organized here to care for their returning fellow countrymen. Back in the interior to which they were driven, committees have been formed in some forty-five localities, and these committees gather the refugees and forward them. Something like half a million Greeks were deported, of whom probably half have perished.

They come to this city in any way they can get here—walking, by rail and by boat. Families, of course, have been separated; most of the men have been in the army, so that the refugees are largely women and children, with a few very old men. When they reach Constantinople they are met by agents of the committee at the usual landing-places. A Russian monastery in the heart of the city had been turned over to the committee by the British and there the refugees are assembled. They are a pitiful sight! Mothers in tatters, some with babies at their breasts; little boys and girls, whose eyes show that they cannot understand what it is all about. Those who can work are put at something while a party is being made up. All of them want to go home, and for most of them home is in Thrace. The rooms of the monastery are almost bare. An old carpet or two, a bundle of rags, these are their beds. There is no furniture. Nearby in a Greek school a soup kitchen has been opened, where as many as a thousand a day are fed. Some children are too little for the rough soup. But prices are high and flour has been very scarce. The coming of American flour, however, has already, within a week of its arrival, reduced the price by more than one-half. As many as 800 men, women and children sleep in the quarters each night.

The story of the Armenian refugees in Constantinople is similar to that of the Greeks, only longer and even sadder, for only from 10 to 15 per cent. are coming back. The others—well, that story will be told in full some day. As soon as the armistice was signed the Armenians began to come back, and those whose homes were in this area came here. So far they have numbered about 20,000. Many of them have been away for four years.

The Armenians get back, first as the Greeks do, on foot, by train and boat. The English have taken over the railroads and certain cars are marked for Armenians, and no one else is allowed to ride in them. The authorities are doing the best they can with the difficult problem of transportation; cars are scarce, and it is not to be wondered at that the cars assigned to these poor wretches are those in which cattle have recently been transported, so that travel has all the discomforts possible. But the refugees are so glad to get back home, to be going toward home, and they have endured so much that cattle cars are Pullmans to them.

What They Want in June

Let us leave this Puffed Grain question to the folks you love to please. What do they like best? What is best for them?

That's what they should have—should they not?

Ask the Boy

what he likes best at breakfast. Serve him some Puffed Grain—a toasted, flavory bubble-grain, and ask what he thinks about it.

But you know what boys think about these food confections. Such foods are resistless.

Ask the Girl

what she likes best in bowls of milk. She will mention some Puffed Grains, probably.

They are crisp and toasted, airy, flaky — four times as porous as bread. So thin and flimsy that they fairly melt.

Ask the Man

what he likes with his berries. Let him mix Puffed Rice in once.

These fragile, nut-like tidbits blend delightfully with fruit. They add what crust adds to a shortcake.

Ask the Doctor what he thinks of whole grains with every food cell exploded. Grain foods made by Prof. Anderson's process, so digestion is easy and so every atom feeds.

You know what he will say — that Puffed Grains are the ideal form of grain food.

Puffed Wheat Puffed Rice and Corn Puffs

These foods seem made for summer—always ready, fascinating, easy to digest. Foods which seem confections, yet scientific foods.

Tests made last September at Cleveland, Ohio, with five 2-ton White trucks carrying full load, showed that on an earth road in fair condition, gasoline consumption was twice that on a concrete road.

The diagrams to the left and right illustrate the relative quantities of gasoline and its cost, used by one truck in making a 100-mile run under the same condition of load over the two roads pictured above. Think what 5,000,000 motor vehicles would save in gasoline alone if they always traveled on concrete!

Since one gallon of gasoline will carry you twice as far on a concrete road as it will on an earth road, why waste the other gallon?

You pay the price of good roads whether you get them or not—and if you pay for concrete roads they pay you back.

PAVE THE ROAD — DOUBLE THE LOAD

Death's Harvest in India

IN a letter just received from Dr. Samuel Higginbottom, superintendent of the Ewing Christian College at Allahabad, India, the writer shows that the united visitations of famine and plague have been much more terrible than was indicated in earlier communications received by the Christian Herald. He says:

"When I wrote you last, it looked as though we would have a fair crop, in spite of an irregular and short rainfall; but for nearly five months most of Northern India has been practically rainless, with the result that we are having one of the most widespread famines of modern times. It will differ, however, from former ones, because there seems to be an unusual amount of public work to be done, irrigation projects, railway building and other building expansion in all parts, due to the end of the war. So there will be not the usual wandering hordes of living skeletons.

"Owing to the scarcity of shipping, there are large grain stocks in the country; but the price is higher than in previous famines. Prices are still rising. Owing to absence of moisture at sowing time, little was sown this year compared with ordinary. Even if we got good winter rains now, we could not get a normal crop, as the area sown is so restricted.

"In Northern Gwalior work is scarce and the population has moved out—men, women, children and cattle and all belongings—trekking southeast, where conditions are better. Many die by the wayside, and it is a serious loss to the State, for it will take years to get the empty villages settled again, and many of the fold now moving out will fail to return.

"Influenza has been fearful! Hundreds of bodies daily floating in the river. No official figures have yet been published for India as a whole, but in villages in Gwalior State that are under my charge the death rate during October and November was from twenty to sixty per cent. Cholera, plague and the other epidemics from which India suffers have never shown such a death rate as influenza. I believe a conservative estimate for the whole of India would be ten per cent., which means thirty-two millions, or many more deaths than the total casualties on all the battle fronts during all the years of the great war.

"In several villages in Gwalior, where we could go in and help the people, warm clothing, food and milk and fires and a little nursing cut down the death rate at once. So many perished because they were too weak to move around and get food after the fever had gone. Oftentimes every person in the village was attacked, so no one was left to nurse the sick or carry away the dead.

"I write thus fully of these two scourges, because I believe that, under God, they can be robbed of their terrors. Influenza and other epidemics call for the extension of a system of sanitation and public health which has already been tried and proved helpful in India. Medical missions have a great field here. With respect to famine, wherever on the mission farm at Allahabad we had prepared the ground by early, deep plowing, and followed American dry farming methods, we got a crop that in an ordinary good year would have been a 100 per cent. crop. If these methods, therefore, were multiplied all over India, a bad season, which now causes incalculable suffering and loss, could be weathered with little or no loss. Thus famine and all its retarding evils is capable of being avoided.

"The government of India is fully alive to the importance of all kinds of agricultural education, and, now that the war is over, is starting all kinds of rural agricultural schools.

Our mission agricultural work, carried on in institutions like Hampton and Tuskegee, are needed as never before. If they are properly staffed and equipped, they can lead the way and government will follow. As always in India's educational progress, missions are the pioneers and government and the country follow. Therefore I am praying that, in these days of reconstruction in India, when there is such social, economic, political and religious ferment as was never before seen in this great needy land, the Christian Church in America will stretch forth a hand and give to the work her sons and daughters, properly trained and equipped, full of the spirit and manner of Jesus, who went about doing good, so that in the years to come India may look back with gratitude on the day when America, out of her abundance, gave to India in her need. At Allahabad we now have such a good start, having served our apprenticeship, and made and overcome our mistakes, that we are ready to use wisely whatever gifts of men and women workers and equipment the Church may send us.

"All during the war, I cheerfully, if unwisely, tried to carry burdens too great for me, hoping that the end of the war would bring relief. Now I find myself more burdened than ever, because the new day calls for more than the old. If we can get passage in July, we hope to be in America next winter, raising funds for the work here. I do not look forward to this with joy, for I feel it is not a wise use of the resources of the Church. My work is here in India, and I should be at it rather than traveling in America. A brief rest in America would be useful, but a long stay there is too hard on the work here.

"The Leper Asylum has had a hard time owing

Prize-Winning Soups

Which American Scientists Bettered

Paris makes a fetish of fine soups. There are culinary contests in which connoisseurs award prizes to the best.

A famous chef from the Hotel Ritz in Paris brought the finest of these recipes to us. Some were prize-winning soups. He made them here—the choicest French creations—as the basis for Van Camp's.

Testing Blends

In these ways, all these famous French soups have been vastly bettered. And the chefs themselves conceded it.

The New-Day Way

But the Van Camp kitchens are directed by scientific cooks. These are experts, college-trained in every detail of the culinary art.

They studied every ingredient and fixed a standard for it.

They tried out countless blends and methods—sometimes hundreds of them. Thus, step by step, they attained in each the pinnacle of flavor.

When all agreed that a soup was perfect, every detail of the making was recorded in a formula. There are pages of minute instructions. So every dish of that soup is exactly like the model.

Now the Parisian connoisseur gets lesser soups than you get. You get them perfected in Van Camp's—get them for a trifle, ready-cooked.

They cost you less than home-made soups. You choose from 18 kinds.

Let the soups themselves convince you. Get two or three kinds from your grocer.

Champion Dependable Spark Plugs

Rigid Inspection Insures Dependability

The skill and pains taken in the final inspection of Champion Spark Plugs are characteristic of the care and thoroughness with which Champion Spark Plugs are made and tested.

This care and thoroughness, coupled with our famous No. 3450 Champion Insulator and our patented asbestos gasket construction, are responsible for the better performance of Champion spark plugs as compared to other plugs, and their greater resisting power to temperature changes and to shock and vibration.

An increasing number of car owners continue to learn the wisdom of insisting upon the spark plug with the name "Champion" on the Insulator and the world trade-mark on the box. This is your safe way to avoid substitutes.

Questions and Answers

READER, Des Moines, Iowa. 1. The democratic idea is of great antiquity. Under the prophets and judges, Israel was a democracy. It was not until they were fascinated by the barbaric splendor and unrestrained license of the heathen nations around them that they began to be dissatisfied with their own simple ways, and to long for a king and a showy court. It was the lure of sin and worldly vanity. Samuel warned them against courts and kings, and told them of what would happen, but his warnings went unheeded. The vision of the age of peace began as early as eight centuries B.C., but it was not until the Christian era that the world change in the existing order fully dawned upon the minds of men. 2. The idea of a League of Nations is not new. Such a league was foreshadowed by Jean Bloch, in his remarkable book, "The Future of War," issued twenty years ago. It was also foreseen by Emanuel Kant, who, in his essay on "Perpetual Peace," wrote that the law of nations must be based on the federation of free states. At different times leaders in national and international reform have had visions of such a league, but always as a possibility of the remote future. It has remained for the United States to promulgate it at a time when the world was prepared to listen.

O. M., Willmar, Minn. We think you must be misinformed when you state that any Christian church refuses a welcome to deaf and dumb persons, or to accept them as members. The two churches you mention are in thorough agreement on all the essentials of the Christian faith, and differ mainly on questions of church government and certain minor requirements. There would be, of course, the same difficulty in either, in dealing with those afflicted as you are, although we believe that proper inquiry would show that both would make you equally welcome.

B. J., Baltimore. According to Food Commissioner Hoover, the United States is now undertaking to feed in Armenia and Finland 20,000,000 persons, in Belgium 7,500,000, in Rumania 13,000,000, in Serbia 13,000,000, in Czechoslovakia 13,000,000, in Poland 20,000,000. When the distress is relieved, these people, whatever their religious or political views may have been, and no matter how little they may know of the nation that sent them succor in their time of direst need, cannot fail to be powerfully impressed by the generosity and helpfulness that saved them from death by starvation and that fought and shed its blood for them, that they might be free and independent.

J. H. S., Washington, D. C. We cannot agree with the criticism that one who prays in the name of Christ does wrong. Jesus was God incarnate. The race of men to whom he came could see and hear and understand even though they might not fully grasp the wonderful mystery of the incarnation. Jesus accepted worship as his due. He forgave sins and he refused to cease to exercise the power and authority to forgive, even rebuking those who objected. The earliest historical characterization of the Christians was that "they offered prayers to Christ as God," and this has been done continuously since then and is done today. "If ye shall ask anything in my name, that will I do." "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son." "And whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he will give it to you." "I and my Father are one." The average man cares little for theological definitions, but he comprehends clearly the great fact that God came and dwelt among men, that Christ was at once the Revealer of divinity and humanity; that he showed men the Way of Life and the fulness of the divine love and mercy. And he taught them how to pray.

Mrs. F. J. B., Hackensack, N. J. The passage in Zech. 8 : 4 is interpreted as referring to longevity during the millennium. The prophet is describing conditions in Jerusalem after the restoration of the Jews to their own land. Life was no longer to be in frequent and deadly peril, but the nation would live in peace and tranquillity, enjoying the fruits of prosperity and realizing the promise of long life, which was regarded among the Jews as one of the greatest of blessings. It was always regarded as a leading feature in millennial forecasts that the people of Israel should be blessed with "multitude of days." In the fifth verse, the picture is one of happy childhood by way of contrast with the experiences of the past. The picture of the street city, full of boys and girls playing, impl fect security as well as abundant pr the latter also being accounted a specia ing among the Jews, as many pass Scripture prove.

M. K. S., Alto Pass, Ill. Why was the lead ship taken from Moses so late in the jo ney, almost within the Promised La Was it intended as a punishment? The Week in the World's News

All members are bound to submit to arbitration of the League disputes likely to lead to ruptures and are bound also not to resort to war until three months after an award. Matters of distinctly domestic jurisdiction are expressly excluded from the action of the League.

A clause was added providing for the exclusion from the League of a member violating the covenant.

The paragraph already reported recognizing the Monroe Doctrine is embodied in the new covenant.

The League is given control of international efforts to regulate commerce and the munitions traffic, traffic in women and children, and in opium, and the covenant binds the members to endeavor to secure fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women and children in all countries.

A paragraph was inserted providing for the promotion of the Red Cross.

An annex to the covenant provides that the initial members of the League shall be, United States of America, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, British Empire, Canada, Australia, South Africa, New South Wales, India, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Hedjaz, Honduras, Italy, Japan, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, Serbia, Siam, Uruguay.

States invited to accede to the covenant: Argentine Republic, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, Netherlands, Norway, Paraguay, Persia, Salvador, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Venezuela.

Far Eastern News

LATEST reports from the orient indicate that all efforts to bring to an end the war between North and South China by means of peace conferences and armistice arrangements have failed. The hindrance to peace now seems to be the famous secret military agreement between the Peking government and the Terauchi ministry in Tokio, signed at the time China declared war on Germany.

The document obviously is the result of the work of the militarists of both countries. Its contents, as they have just become known, provide for the establishment of arsenals at Tientsin, Hankow and Shanghai, Japan to supply the construction materials and engineers; the Chinese Government, for ten successive years, shall buy $15,000,000 worth of arms and ammunition direct from such arsenals.

The agreement further provides for the establishment of a national defense army and the purchase from Japan of $20,000,000 worth of arms and ammunition, pending the construction of the arsenals. Japanese officers are to direct the organization of the army. After the armistice in Europe, when $3,000,000 worth of the arms had been delivered, further shipments were held up.

The principal cause of the break in the Shanghai peace conference was the fear on the part of South China that the Peking régime was preparing for a large scale military campaign against the Cantonese army. A condition to a continuance of the negotiations provided for the withdrawal of the northern forces from Shensi province, which President Hsu refused.

There were strong hopes that the conference would be resumed the second week in April. The civil war is costing the Peking government $15,000,000 a month, and is preventing all administrative reforms.

THE KOREAN TURMOIL. The Rev. Eli M. Mowry of Mansfield, O., Presbyterian missionary who was arrested in Ping Yang, Korea, on a charge of aiding Korean rebels, has been found guilty in a Japanese court and sentenced to six months imprisonment at hard labor. He is now at liberty on bail. An official Japanese statement on native casualties attributed to the revolution places the number, on April 21, at about 1,100. The Japanese governor general has promised a delegation of foreign residents of Seoul to adopt less severe measures in his treatment of demonstrants for Korean independence.

Bag from Scraps of Ribbon

MARIE found two short pieces of ribbon in her mother's rag-bag and decided that, if put together, they would make a pretty work bag.

One of the pieces was solid old-rose in color and the other was white with old-rose flowers on it. Marie sewed the two together and then set about making a bottom for the bag.

This was made by covering two discs of cardboard with left-over bits of the solid old-rose ribbon, the discs then being sewed together with an overhand stitch around the edges.

Marie next gathered the edge of the solid-color ribbon to the discs, and ran a seam up one side of the bag where the ribbon joined.

The top of the bag was turned down, leaving a short heading (see illustration) and two short lengths of rose-color baby ribbon were run through two rows of stitching to form drawstrings.

When Marie's girl friends saw her pretty bag they hunted up scraps of ribbon and made similar little bags to hold their needles, thread and thimbles.

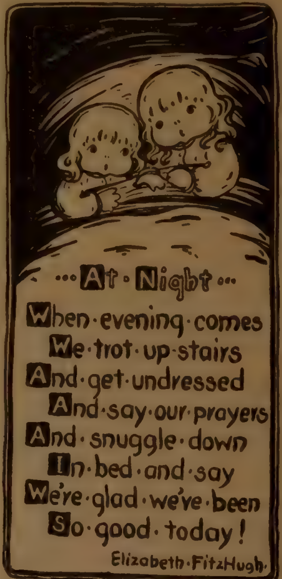
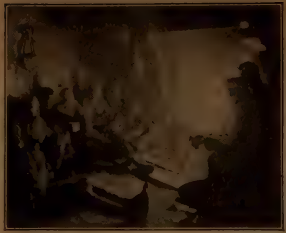
Velvet May Be Steamed

VELVET may be steamed by one of two methods. By the first, the velvet is held in front of the spout of a steaming tea-kettle and the steam allowed to pass through the velvet. The velvet must not be held too close or steam spots will be made. The velvet must be brushed immediately after the steaming. By the second method, the velvet is held over a hot iron which has been covered with a damp cloth.





WAITING

By Margaret E. Sangster

"I WONDER what they're doin' home tonight?"
Jim said.
We sat there in the yeller firelight,
There in a house in France—
Some of us, maybe, thinkin' of nonsense—
Some of us missin' buddies who was dead—
And some just dreamin',
Sorter hardly seemin'
Ter make the dream come clear.

An' then Jim spoke.
"I wonder what they're doin' home ternight?"
Says Jim.
An' some of us felt—well, as if we'd like
Ter smother him!
An' some of us tried hard-like not ter choke—
Th' smoke
Was pretty thick an' black!

A thinkin' back,
Across th' ocean I could sort of see
A little house that means just all ter me;
And, though nobody said a word, I knew
Their thoughts was goin' on th' self-same track.
Thoughts do,
Out here in France.

Home!—Home! No wonder that we all was still;
For one of us was thinkin' of a hill,
With pine trees on it black against th' moon;
And one of us was dreaming of a town,
All drab an' brown;
An' one of us was lookin' far an' high
Ter some one who had gone back home too soon,
To that real Home that is beyond th' sky.

Nobody of us spoke fer quite a while;
We didn't smile;
We just sat still an' wondered when there'd be
An order for ter send us home—
Back 'cross the sea.
Th' war was won—
An' we was done!
We wanted faces that we loved an' knew,
An' voices too . . .

We sat an' watched th' dancin' fire fling
It's shadders on th' floor—
Bright shapes, an' thin.
An' then Jim coughed as if his throat was sore,
An'—"Say; let's sing!"
Said Jim.

A GREAT KOREAN SERIA

"CHANSUNG'S CONFESSION," by DR. WILLIAM N. BLAIR, will begin June 7

A STRONG serial story, laid in Korea, will start in the Christian Herald at once, now that Korea is in the limelight of revolution.

CHANSUNG'S CONFESSION, by William N. Blair, D.D., is peculiarly of Christian Herald character, having powerful mission interest and appeal.

CHANSUNG'S CONFESSION is a particularly timely story, picturing the character of the Christian missionaries who are now suffering Japanese persecution, and the sterling qualities of the Korean people who are now passively striving for their independence.

One would hardly expect that a story starting out with a young Korean's cracking his child wife's head with an ironing stick, and then taking to the wilderness, would swiftly develop into one of the most powerful impulses for foreign missions ever written; but such is CHANSUNG'S CONFESSION.

It is a story rich in Korean coloring and native incident, packed with information about the customs of the people, particularly on the religious side, and has enough touch of the spiritual to give it real substance.

Dr. Blair knows Korea; he knows human life; he holds the highest Christian ideals; and he has written this great story out of the depths of his heart.

Dr. William N. Blair, author of "Chansung's Confession"

Dr. Blair's work in Korea has be most entirely evangelistic, much time being spent in the country, in Korean houses and preaching t people in the churches and in their and by the wayside.

The scenes in CHANSUNG'S FESSION are all of places which h visited many times. The characte reflect individual men and women h known intimately in Korea.

While drawing on his imaginatio certain details, much of the story r actual experiences. All of it is a picture, we believe, of the country people.

Dr. Blair was present in Pyeng City during the Japan-Russian He was one of the men who had ch of the Great Revival Meetings in 1 when many dramatic confessions made by Koreans.

There are now seven Presbyterian six Methodist churches in Pyengy and Dr. Blair is pastor of the Third byterian Church in the city and of fifty country churc

Complete illustrations, picturing the costumes, archi ture and characteristics of the people and country, are ing carefully prepared by an able artist.

The Christian Herald editors are sure that CHANSUN CONFESSION will prove to be a story without disappo ment or regrets for the reader.

It will start in the issue of June 7 and run 10 we

MANY IMPORTANT ARTICLES COMING

CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS will be thoroughly pleased with many important features coming immediately.

Never before has Christianity confronted so gigantic a task as that of world reconstruction; never before had it so glorious an opportunity to advance the cause of Christ, and never was it so well united in purpose, zeal and method. Wonderful plans, wonderful efforts, wonderful achievements are coming in the kingdom of God on earth. United prayers, strivings, endeavors are going to bring awakening, evangelization and regeneration on such a scale as the world never has witnessed. With these mighty movements the Christian Herald is inseparably identified, as it is with every form of Christian interest. Filling its wide field of spiritual service, this journal will record and interpret all phases of religious thought and activity in all denominations, and in all parts of the world.

Here are listed a few of the timely articles that are coming immediately.

Four Great Movements in Present Day History

CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D., the famous pastor and author, is preparing for immediate publication in the Christian Herald a series of four articles on

THE PROHIBITION MOVEMENT
THE INDUSTRIAL MOVEMENT
THE MISSIONARY MOVEMENT
THE INTERNATIONAL MOVEMENT

Dr. Sheldon's ability and high ideals guarantee that these articles on the greatest topics of today will be of remarkable penetration and power. The first article will appear next week and the others will follow weekly.

A League of Christian Laymen

SOME time ago, Evangelist Milford H. Lyon, President of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, in a short article in the Christian Herald threw out the suggestion of forming a League of Laymen. It caught on amazingly, and now the President-Evangelist, in response to many requests, gives further and fuller reasons why there should be such a League in order to press forward the campaign for souls and the work of the Kingdom at this time.

"The Rock of the Marne"

CHAPLAIN G. W. RIDOUT, who has been through the struggle of the Marne and has ministered to the boys at the front on many a battlefield, both before and after the fighting, had a wonderful inspiration in connection with the brilliant action which gave to one of our American regiments the name of the "Rock of the Marne." The chaplain wove this into a talk which he gave to our U. S. soldiers at Marseilles before embarkation. Many who heard him had been participants in the battle. The chaplain's address has the genuine Christian crusader ring.

How a Community Found Itself

MANY of us have at some time or other li in a community where things seemed t spiritually at sixes and sevens. Those who h had such an experience, will welcome this st from real life, showing how a community wh had been aimlessly drifting, found itself and into the right spiritual line of service that brou happiness and uplift and energy and zeal i the churches and the homes. Pastor Hopk of Pittsfield, the author, is at the head of a s cessful Community Church, so he knows whe he speaks.

Leaders interested in the You People's Movement and Pastors and Laym vitally concerned in the future of the church a its message, will answer this question in a sy posium soon to be published in the Christi Herald which will show how the great line leadership, represented by the boys changi back from khaki to citizens' dress may be turn into lines of spiritual activity instead of bei secularized in the domains of business and po tics. The Peace Treaty Now Ready lied Lack of Harmony Hinders Progress at Versailles—Italy May Yet Be Placated—Belgium Dissatisfied—Germany's Delegates Receive the Peace Terms

© Underwood & Underwood
The Palace at Versailles where the Peace Congress will meet. Captured German guns bear eloquent testimony to Allied victory

WHEN will we have peace? Women, viting at empty f sides in twenty ions, have asked Men, facing lonely outposts along Rhine, have ed it. Thousands manufacturers, ious to speed up wheels, have ed it. Labor, king to preserve peace the industl advantages n under war conions, has asked The hungry, the dened, the retly liberated, the tors and the vanshed, all alike ve united in this mentous questn. All have tched eagerly, h alternate hope l misgiving, the w progress of nts in the Conence of the Allies ich was to pree the plan upon ich should be sed the final ucture of peace.

On May 5, the npleted Treaty s in the hands of printers. The rman delegates, th all the auxiliary commissions, a total of over) persons, had reached Versailles. The Allied ders had requested Austria and Hungary to send ir delegates. The Allied program provided for the livery, not later than May 8, of the completed eaty to the German delegates at the first session of Peace Congress. There was a possibility that ace, as far as Germany is concerned, would be an omplished fact before the end of May. Settlents with Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria and Turkey, tlined, forecasted and agreed to by Germany in the st treaty signed, were expected to follow rapidly.

The Italian obstacle to peace also, on May 5, peared to be yielding to saner counsel. Public ling in Italy was coming around to an appreciation the fact that Italy could not afford to estrange r allies, on whom she must depend for raw materials d markets in the resumption of normal commerce. emier Orlando, whose withdrawal from the Conence had given a dramatic aspect to the situation, ld a series of conferences in Rome in the first days May with American Ambassador Page, French nbassador Barrere, and a special messenger sent by oyd George. Fiume continued loudly to protest r desire to be Italian; but correspondents implied at the degree of her inclusion under Italian sovergnty was open to negotiation, and that compromise ly awaited proposals from the three remaining embers of the "Big Four," Orlando feeling that it ould be unbecoming for Italy to make advances.

On May 4, President Wilson and Premiers Lloyd eorge and Clemenceau were reported to have sent to emier Orlando a united formal invitation to the alian delegation to resume its place in the Peace onference. This was held to imply more than a ere readiness to compromise; in fact, it was believed to indicate that a basis of compromise had been reached. There had been considerable question as to whether a peace treaty could be signed without Italy. The Italian press insisted that the Allies were bound not to make a separate peace, and besides, there was the possibility that the Germans might insist on Italian concurrence before affixing their own signatures to the Treaty. It was announced on May 5 that Premier Orlando would leave Rome that evening for Paris.

TROUBLE and dissension broke out in a new place unexpectedly, when Belgium, on May 3, appeared in the rôle of an obstructor to peace. Her delegates were reported to have been instructed not to sign any treaty which did not provide for the complete restoration and indemnification of Belgium, guaranteeing her economic future and military security. On May 4, Belgium was said to have been assured of 2,500,000,000 francs, gold, from the first payment of indemnity by Germany, and a proposal was implied by which Belgium's war debt would be cleared up. The Belgian Cabinet was considering the proposals to decide whether or not the conditions offered were acceptable.

JUSTICE, both retributive and poetic, ruled in Versailles on May 1, when the head of the German peace delegation, Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, left the Hotel des Reservoirs to meet the French delegates at the Hotel Trianon. The meeting at 3 P. M. on May 1 was held for exchange of credentials, and lasted but five minutes. It was recalled that, in 1870, Louis Thiers, at the head of the French delegation, walked from the Hotel des Reservoirs, and crossed the park to the Hotel Trianon, where Prince Bismarck awaited him, and it had been planned to make the meeting of the delegates on May 1 a crowning contrast of poetic justice, by letting the German delegates walk over the same ground; but an unexpected rain made it necessary to use automobiles. Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau was met by M. Cambon, who was France's Ambassador in Berlin at the opening of the war, and who presented the credentials of the Allied peace delegates to the Germans in a very brief speech. Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau was too much overcome by his feelings to make anything more than a brief acknowledgment in reply, as he handed his credentials and those of his associates to M. Cambon. It was expected that the Peace Conference would convene in the dining-room of the Hotel Trianon, on Wednesday or Thursday, May 7 or 8. The plan of procedure was reported to be substantially as follows: The peace was to be a victor's peace, and to follow the precedents in such cases, being dictated by the victor. The Germans will receive the text of the treaty and will not be permitted to discuss it orally with the Allied delegates, but will be allowed fifteen days in which to submit objections in writing. These will be considered by the Allies for five days, or as long as necessity may require. The treaty will then be prepared and presented to the enemy envoys for their signatures.

ADDRESSING the Italian Senate on April 30, Premier Orlando told the story of the events in Paris which had led up to the return home of the Italian delegation. He showed that President Wilson had sent him a memorandum on April 14, which was practically identical with the statement later given to the world by the press. While he said that the situation was very grave, it was the duty of Italy to preserve an attitude of calm and serenity. He declared that the President's proposal accorded only incomplete liberty to Fiume, breaking up the unity of Istria, and denied Italy's rights over the Dalmatian islands; but that the Italian delegation had attempted, through the following days, to find a way to conciliation. The Chamber of Deputies, by a vote of 382 to 20, adopted a resolution of confidence in Orlando and the delegation to the Peace Conference. This vote was concurred in by the Italian Senate.

ANOTHER possible storm center developed in connection with Japan's claims in China. Following hearings covering several days, President Wilson and Premiers Lloyd George and Clemenceau were reported, on April 30, to have decided that the German

Mailing the Red Terror

ON APRIL 29 a bomb sent through the mails to Ex-Senator Thomas W. Hardwick was delivered at his residence and exploded when opened by a negro maid. The explosion tore off both hands of the maid and severely injured Mrs. Hardwick. The package was similar to one received the day before by Mayor Ole Hanson of Seattle, which did no damage. Both packages were mailed from New York. On April 30 it was discovered that sixteen more packages of the same sort addressed to men in public life, and prominent citizens, had been held in the New York post office for insufficient postage. A careful examination showed that all were infernal machines carefully made according to the same design: a wooden tube with a screw cap. Inside of the tube was dynamite in contact with percussion caps which were just beneath a bottle filled with an acid capable of detonating them. The unscrewing of the caps released the acid.

Because of the persons addressed suspicion was directed immediately to the I. W. W., and all of the detective forces of the country were put to work to run down the persons who had planned to celebrate May Day by the wholesale murder of American officers and citizens. Some of those to whom packages were addressed, all the names were not published, were, Associate Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes of the Supreme Court, who had prepared the opinion of the court which sustained the conviction of Eugene V. Debs; Attorney-General A. Mitchell Palmer, who, with Anthony Caminetti and Frederick C. Howe, Commissioners of Immigration, also intended victims, was responsible for the plan to deport aliens advocating the overthrow of the United States Government; Postmaster-General Burleson; Federal Judge K. M. Landis of Chicago, who presided over the trial of Haywood and his associates, ninety-five of whom were convicted and sentenced to prison; Wm. H. Lamar, Solicitor of the Post Office Department, who reported to the Senate the results of an investigation as to the spread of Bolshevism in this country; Chas. N. Fickert, District Attorney of San Francisco, and Edward Cunha, Assistant District Attorney of San Francisco, both of whom were accused of framing up the case against Tom Mooney; W. M. Wood of Boston, head of the American Woolen Company, around whose mills in Lawrence, Mass., there had centered strikes intended to eventuate in revolution and a Soviet Government; Governor W. C. Sproul of Pennsylvania, who had been responsible for a telegram from the Governor's Congress to a New York Labor Union implicated in Bolshevism, and John L. Burnett. Chairman of the Immigration Committee of the House of Representatives, who had introduced into Congress a bill intended to bar from the country persons of Bolshevist tendencies. Packages were also mailed to John D. Rockefeller and J. P. Morgan and to the Mayor and Police Commissioner of New York City and the Attorney-General of Pennsylvania. On May 1 ten bombs were discovered in the mails addressed to Senator Overman of North Carolina; Senator King of Utah, and Frank K. Nedekar, who prosecuted the I. W. W. leaders tried before Judge Landis.

The New York police and Federal detective service are reported to have in their possession the names of over 2,200 alien agitators. The bomb plot was considered by the authorities to be the greatest murder conspiracy in the history of the nation. It was believed to have been directed against the enforcement of the deportation provision of the immigration law and to be intended to intimidate the next Congress in which it is expected measures will be introduced to restrict immigration.

The immediate effect of the discovery of this plot against the officers of the government was to stimulate the heads of the proper committees and the members of Congress to immediate action, as soon as the new Congress convenes, for the passage of legislation which will bar from our shores alien agitators and provide for their prompt deportation when they abuse our hospitality. Drastic legislation for the control of those persons of warped mentality who seek the overthrow of all governments is certain to result from this attempt upon the lives of public men.

On May 2 immigration authorities began a round up of alien revolutionists in San Francisco, Seattle, and other western points, most of whom will probably be deported.

The Week in the World's News

BOLSHEVISM BEING BEATEN. On May 5, after a week of reverses, the Bolshevist situation was about as follows: The Russian Bolsheviki were retreating before the troops of the Siberian Government of Admiral Kolchak, which had been greatly strengthened by receipt of guns and ammunition from the Allies. In the north the troops of the North Russian Government were driving the Reds southward, and the Finns, who took the offensive during the week, had cut the communications of the Bolshevist northern army and were reported to have taken Petrograd. In the south the Russian and Ukrainian Reds were said to have formed an alliance against Rumania and to have demanded Rumanian evacuation of Bessarabia. Meanwhile Rumanian armies were at the gates of Bucharest in company with the Serbians, French and Czechoslavs and the Communist Government of Bela Kun was either tottering or already fallen. Munich, the Red center in Bavaria, was in Government hands on May 3, and, except for a few scattered centers in Saxony, Germany was purged of Bolshevist governments.

MAY DAY BATTLES. Labor's international holiday, May Day, failed to live up to the anticipation of trouble which had been expected by the nations. Plans of the various radical organizations for a one-day strike in Paris were a complete success, not a wheel turning in the capital of France, while business of every kind, including hotels, restaurants, even drug stores, was suspended. The authorities refused to permit parades and barred the crowds from Le Place de la Concorde. The crowd was in general orderly, but there were few conflicts with the police and mounted troops, in which some 428 policemen were wounded and 50 arrests were made. May Day was quiet in Berlin. In Madrid there were several clashes between crowds and the police.

Riots occurred in the United States in Chicago, Cleveland and Boston, and a parade of one-day strikers in Detroit was stopped by the police because no permit had been granted, and the paraders were violating the law against carrying the red flag. Plans for great May Day parades in New York were rained out, the only situation that promised possibilities being a great meeting in Madison Square Garden in the interests of justice for Tom Mooney. The police, protecting the meeting, effectively prevented disorder. One person was killed in Cleveland and over 200 hurt in the process of putting down the riots. Four persons were shot during the riots in Boston.

English and Scotch labor conducted itself quietly, the only event of the day being an attempt of militant suffragettes to force their way into the House of Commons.

ALFONSO DISSOLVES PARLIAMENT. King Alfonso on May 2 signed a decree dissolving the Spanish Parliament and calling general elections for June 1.

BATTLESHIP TENNESSEE LAUNCHED. The super-dreadnought Tennessee, the greatest fighting ship in any navy of the world, was launched at the New York Navy Yard on Wednesday morning, April 30. While Tennessee is a prohibition state, and a protest had been made, wine was used in the christening of the ship. The ship, however, immediately took to water. The Tennessee exceeds by some 600 tons the largest battleship of the Japanese navy and by over 4,000 tons Britain's ships of the Queen Elizabeth class. With a displacement of 46,200 tons she will have a speed of 21 knots. The hull is 624 ft. long, 97 ft. 5¾ inches wide, and her draught will be 30 ft. 6 inches. Her main battery will consist of 12 14-inch rifles.

ENFORCING PROHIBITION. Several rumors that the effect of the laws as they stood left the enforcement of prohibition up in the air were set at rest late in April by an announcement from the Attorney General that his office had ample authority and would enforce the law. One of the main hopes of the wets was blasted on May 1, when the Supreme Court of Oregon held that a popular referendum on the action of the legislature in ratifying the prohibition amendment was unconstitutional. The court decision was unanimous.

There is a possibility that the country may face a few months of liquor selling before the Federal amendment takes effect on January 16, 1920. The war prohibition under which the country will be dry after July 1 will end when the President proclaims demobilization complete. At the present rate of 300,000 per month, soon to be increased to 450,000, demobilization will be complete some time in September, 1919.

THE DIVISION OF THE FLEET. It was reported on May 1 that the question of the disposition of the German fleet had been compromised, Italy and France each to receive some of the big warships, and the balance probably to be destroyed.

CABLES RETURNED TO OWNERS. Postmaster General Burleson, by direction of the President, in response to his own request, returned the trans-Atlantic and trans-Pacific cable systems to their owners on May 2. It was recommended that the telephone and telegraph systems of the country be returned as soon as Congress could safeguard the interests of the owners.

PRESIDENT WILL LAUNCH LEAGUE. It was announced from Paris on April 29 and 30 that the first meeting of the League of Nations would be held at Washington in October, 1919, subject to a call by and under the presidency of Woodrow Wilson. Preparatory details will be worked out at temporary headquarters in London during the summer, under the direction of Sir James Eric Drummond, the first Secretary General of the League, elected by the pl conference of the Peace Conference on April 28. Swiss Republic will build a palace for the perma seat of the League of Nations on a beautiful sit Lake Geneva. Until the completion of the new b ing, the Palais Eynard, near the University of Ge will be put at the disposal of the League.

CHILD LABOR TAX VOID. Federal Judge Boy Greensboro, N. C., on May 2 declared uncons tional, as being a regulation of employment by direction and an invasion of the state's authority section of the Revenue Bill levying a tax of 10 cent. on products of factories employing children u fourteen years of age. This ruling is of course su to review by the Supreme Court.

EARTHQUAKE KILLS SEVENTY. An earthquak April 25 in San Salvador did extensive damage to city and neighboring towns, killing seventy per and injuring more than 500.

CHURCHES RECEIVE EVICTEES. New York faces a serious problem. Living apartments are sufficient in number, landlords are raising rents yond the ability of many to pay, and those who can pay are evicted in spite of the fact that they are una to find other quarters. Three thousand pers threatened with eviction on May 1 were grante stay until May 5 in the New York City Munici Courts. In order to provide for these persons state's committee on rent profiteering sought means shelter all persons left dispossessed. The Navy I partment promised bedding, and the Army cots a tents, which could be erected on vacant lots. T New York City authorities of the M. E. Church fered to the city's committee the free use of the Sund school rooms and parish houses under its control the city. Thirty-five of them were found suitable, a it was estimated that they would accommodate 8,0 persons.

TO EUROPE OVER SEAS. The Navy announced May 1 that the flight to be attempted by the h N. C. machines would be from Newfoundland to th Azores, and from there to Portugal, and possibly fro Lisbon to Plymouth, England. Part of the Atlant fleet left the port of New York on May 1 to assist the flight. The big battle ships will take positio along the line of the flight, while the fast destroye will travel in the direction of the flight at a distan of fifty miles apart.

The United States mine layer Aroostook with th crew of the naval air station, which will be maintaine as a base for the American flying boats, anchored a St. Johns, Newfoundland, on May 2. It was expecte that the three naval machines would leave Rockawa on May 5 or 6 and start the trans-Atlantic flight week later.

The Peace Treaty Now Ready concessions in the Shantung Peninsula, including Kiao-Chau and the railway and mining privileges should be transferred by the Peace Treaty from Germany to Japan, with the understanding that Japan would withdraw her troops as soon as possible and restore the sovereignty of the territory to China, in accordance with her pledges made at the beginning of the war and frequently repeated. The Chinese delegation were reported as very much disturbed over this settlement, feeling that it indirectly validated the secret treaties forced upon China by Japan in 1915 and 1918, under which China's independence of action and sovereignty are severely impaired. As the compromise stands, Japan, which really wanted to keep Shantung, is bound to return it to China as soon as her troops can be withdrawn, while China, which asked that the concessions be entirely revoked, secures the return of her sovereignty, modified slightly by commercial concessions and railroad rights, which remain in Japan's hands.

Some sensational correspondents in Paris, discussing the situation, said that President Wilson, in deciding his attitude on Kiao-Chau, was forced to consider the possibility of Japan withdrawing from the Conference and the League of Nations plan, and uniting with Russia and Germany in alliance against the League of Nations.

THE Peace Treaty according to Associated Press dispatches, will consist of fifteen to twenty chapters, or approximately 70,000 words. The text of the treaty was being cabled to America on May 3, and it was expected that it would be made public simultaneously in all countries.

The peace terms as proposed transferred from Germany to France 70 per cent. of the iron ore production of the former German empire, one-third of the coal production, 20 per cent. of the potash, and nearly 8,000,000 of the population.

Canada's Way to Church Unity

A Precedent for the Churches of the United States

By H. K. CARROLL, LL.D.

T ALWAYS makes a difference to those who are casting up a highway through the wilderness to know of the rude blazed way which pioneers have made. The union of a score of Evangelical adian denominations, the plan for which is now ging the earnest attention of Church leaders, is rded as remarkable. These same denominations part of a federation which has been in existence at least ten years. In its latest development, it is e than a federation, however. As a practical rt at organic union of denominations of different in, history, polity, name and doctrine, it is absoly without a precedent.

ur Canadian cousins are people of like character h ourselves. They are democratic and their gious history is similar to our own. Many of our isions are theirs also. They have, however, shown tronger sympathy for Christian Unity than has possessed us. They began early in the present tury to bring together the members of their thodist group, and also those of the Presbyterian up.

s early as 1875, the four Presbyterian branches n existing had become one. The Methodist group, luding the Methodist Episcopal, originally part of Church of the same name in the United States, the mitive, the British Wesleyan, the New Connecn, the Bible Christian and other varieties, began to ne together in 1874, and completed the process in 33, since which year there has been but one Methom, virtually, in Canada.

n both cases, the union was satisfactory and pernent. Perhaps the success of these two movents gave the necessary impetus to a still larger position for the union of Methodists, Presbytens, Baptists and Congregationalists. The anuncement created more surprise and doubt among ethodists and Presbyterians in the United States an rejoicing, and few believed the movement would me to anything. But it did. The Baptists felt at they must, on account of their principles, mainin a separate existence, and the Episcopalians still ve the matter under advisement, but the other ree bodies came to an agreement upon a basis of ion which was to be an actual merging, all deminational names, systems, practices, etc., to cease such and a United Church to take their place.

The final agreement between Presbyterians and ethodists was for comity and cooperation. Action as taken by the Methodist General Conference in 02 favorable to a comprehensive scheme of Chrisan Unity. A committee was created which met in 03 with committees of the Presbyterian and Conegational Churches, which had taken action with romptness. The joint committee expressed themlves as of "one mind" as to the desirability and racticability of organic union, and so reported to eir respective bodies. From this time on, the work preparing for the union went on till it was comleted in 1908. The basis of union was submitted to e various churches and was adopted by all, the resbyterian communicant vote being 106,755 for and 8,278 against; the Methodist, 150,841 for and 4,357 against; and the Congregational, 2,933 for and 13 against. Of Methodist members under eighteen ears old, 117,198 voted for and 2,615 against, showing hat the young are more favorable to union than the ld.

The size of the Presbyterian minority delayed conummation, and further amendments to the basis of nion were proposed and adopted. The war came on ubsequently and the Presbyterian Assembly deemed t best to postpone the actual merging until peace hould be restored. It is interesting to note that hen the vote was taken on the question of union, wo statements were drawn up for circulation, one iving the arguments for union and the other those gainst it. The circular favoring union mentioned hese as reasons for it: "(a) The condition of our ewer West; (b) the weakened state of rural churches n older Canada; (c) the social disorder of city lums; (d) the problem of the foreigner; (e) the need f the heathen world." After the war an equal numer of very different reasons were set forth by the Presbyterian Assembly, all calling strongly for union. Among them are these: "A changed judgment of values, so that matters which formerly distracted and divided are now accounted trivial; a weakening of class distinctions, which renders possible a degree of united action hitherto impracticable; a new spirit of acrifice, which subordinates everything to the supreme purpose of making Christ known as the hope of the world."

The consolidation may take place in the very near future, depending largely on the action of the Presbyterian General Assembly, which desires to reduce the opposed minority as much as possible.

The basis of union consists of twenty articles of aith for "The United Church of Canada," five chapers on polity, with separate chapters on the Ministry and Administration. The polity is presbyterial, with sessions, presbyteries, annual conferences (corresponding to synods), and a General Council having full powers of legislation, supreme judicial authority and control over matters of denominational concern and relations with other bodies. The United Church will be a body of about 725,000 communicants.

Why should not the American Ad Interim Committee follow this precedent in its attempt to work out a plan of union for the Evangelical Churches of the United States? Doubtless it will formulate an alternative scheme of this kind. There are a few members who would prefer it to Federal Union. But it should be remembered (1) that the Canadian plan has not yet been put into operation and therefore has not been tested by actual trial; (2) that it involves a consolidation of only three bodies, while there are twenty or more denominations cooperating in the Philadelphia movement; (3) that the sentiment for union is more advanced in Canada than in the United States, the Presbyterians and the Methodists having united their several branches a generation ago.

A Suggestion for Church Unity

I AM much interested in the propaganda you are making in the Christian Herald in behalf of Church Union. Many able things have been said on the subject, but I do not remember that any one has suggested a plan by which a union might be effected. I therefore offer the following suggestion, which might serve as a nucleus for a union of the churches. It is a simple idea which involves simply a small but natural addition to the name of each denomination.

To the present name let each denomination add the word "Christian." They would then be designated as the Methodist Episcopal Christian Church, the Presbyterian Christian Church, the Episcopal Christian Church, the Baptist Christian Church, and so on with all of them. This is simply stating in a word just what every church claims to be. This would place the emphasis where it belongs, on what the churches are and what they stand for, rather than on the denominational name, which serves to emphasize only their differences rather than their unity. This would furnish a common name wherein the different denominations could be united, and yet maintain their own denominational names and organizations if they desired to do so.

The United States is a good illustration. It is composed of forty-eight states at present, but each state has its own name and its own separate organization. But they all have the common name, state, as the State of New York, the State of Ohio, the State of California, and so on, and on this common name they are all united into one great state called the State of the Union, or the United States. In like manner, the Christian denominations, all having the common name "Christian," might be united into a Christian Union or the United Christian Church of America, and yet each denomination preserve its own individuality.

A "Work-and-Recreation" Program for the Church

AS a minute-man of the Centenary Movement of the Methodist Episcopal Church, I am much interested in the discussions published in the Christian Herald. They are of vital importance.

We are at a place where the churches must make radical changes to meet the requirements of the changing hour. Not a step must be taken that will lessen the teaching of Christ's power to save; but as our Saviour spread a feast on the grassy slopes, so must we make provision for those who have no home life, who need a place to rest, to read, to do some little piece of work, to meet a friend, or to be entertained.

Many of our churches are financially in a position to erect commodious buildings with accommodation for gymnasium, reading, recreation, lunch, bath, and work rooms. The last should contain machines, such as lathes for iron or wood, drills, saws, with glass cases for display of work or articles of interest. All these departments and appliances should be absolutely free to friend and stranger alike; everybody welcome, with no list of fines and penalties, and with no rules that ought not to be enforced in an ordinary street car. Let refreshments be sold at prices sufficient to cover cost and service.

No one should be urged to attend church meetings, but on the menu card, or in some other definite way, all church activities should be mentioned.

I have no doubt such places, located in proper sections of a city, would build up churches, promote a practical feeling of cooperation, bring mechanic in touch with mechanic, help them join hands with Christian people, and thus break down the antagonism now existing among workingmen against church promoters and the Church.

An occasional "movie" would no doubt add much to the above.

Unite To Serve But Keep Your Own House

THE Church of God is composed of holy people, regardless of denominational relations. Those who are regenerate in heart, Christlike in spirit and godly in deportment are members of the Church, members of his body, his flesh and his bones. They love what Jesus loves and hate what he hates. In spirit they are even now one, even as our Lord prayed. In this Church of the living God no evil abides. Indeed, there is not a sinner in it, nor a saint out of it. It really embraces all the saved, the household of faith.

But the churches, the sects or denominations, are all of human origin and fit into human requirements. While none of them is "the Church," yet they serve a useful purpose and fit into human needs because of human idiosyncrasies. And it is well. They allow room for adaptation to the human viewpoint. The writer is a Methodist, and while recognizing the noble character developed by other denominations, and possessing a spirit of love for all who follow our Lord, yet he would find it difficult to accept the doctrinal statements that exactly please many devout Christians. Consequently, it seems best to love each other fervently, to cooperate in all good works, but each to keep his own house.

One great danger from too much union is, it heads backward, not forward. The Middle Ages show us one church, and that a bloated, baptized paganism. We want no more of it, with its hands dyed in human gore. Let us unite to serve, but keep house in our own enclosure. Preach Christ crucified and coming again in glory. Make much of a religion built on the Bible, that emphasizes the atonement of Jesus, that exalts him as men's only hope and the world's rightful King.

After Liberty, Justice

PROVIDENCE has perfected His ideal of liberty through the World War. Wilson has started a League of Nations to insure peace in the world. But after liberty, what? Shall we rest on our oars? Can we stop in the middle of the stream of time? We cannot. We must either keep rowing up the stream or stop and be driven back downward, for swift is the force of the current.

After liberty, what? Justice. A professor used to say "justice, apparently, is the best word in the language." It is not; of course, mercy is better than justice; it is more divine, and so better and more perfect.

We have seen the turmoil without precedent during the twentieth century, a barbarian invasion by the Germans. We have peace, militarily speaking. But we have struggle, economically speaking, throughout the civilized world. What does it mean? It seems to mean, to those who have eyes to see, that the greatest war in history has started something. It means that this quaking of the mountain has produced more than a mouse. It means that the problematical League of Nations is not the only thing born out of these pregnant times—that something new is on the way; that justice, economic and social, is going to be established in the world of men. The peoples of the nations are aflame with the thought that might does not make right, not only in the case of might of the sword, but also might of intellect, of physical power, of money power, of power of position. That might does not make right in all planes of human life. And the time has come to apply and administer not only political and military justice between nations, but social and economic justice between the peoples and classes of the nations of the world, and the countless millions will not rest on their oars after attaining a questionable international peace, but will keep going on till they establish justice to end poverty, which has caused more misery and sickness and crime in the world than any single thing since the creation.

But the creation of the world is not over. It has hardly begun, so far as the most important part is concerned, the world of humanity. The social and economic spheres of the world are in a state of chaos, without form and void. The Spirit of God seems to be moving now on the face thereof to work the creation. The barren places of this earth will be made to grow the flowers of love and the fruits of mutual help and cooperation. The demons of selfishness will be fought and overthrown. Justice must be created to let every human being enjoy the good things of life, which, together with brotherhood that will make the sorrow of one the sorrow of all, and the joy of one the joy of all, will help in bringing the completion of the creation nearer.

Our Besetting Sins

*A SERMON BY REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

TEXT—Song of Solomon 2:15. "The little foxes that spoil the vineyards."

PEOPLE who of set purpose are hostile to man's law and God's law, and are trying to make a living by criminal practices, are not exceedingly numerous. It is not alone what we call great, coarse crimes and misdemeanors that give to a city or community a low moral tone of life. In fact, the actual outbreaking sins which call for human punishment probably do not create as much trouble in the long run as what we call the little sins of life, which persist in the community as a whole, lower its ethical standard, deaden its spiritual enthusiasm and make impossible what we call growth in the higher life. In mentioning a few of the little foxes which destroy the beautiful vineyard of Christian character we do so not in a spirit of cynical fault-finding, but for the purpose of reminding ourselves, perhaps, of errors so common that we are not duly conscious of them, and also for the larger purpose of giving us an insight into sins which can be corrected and should be driven out of the Christian life.

I have asked a number of people to tell me what they thought were the besetting little sins of what we call good people, that is, church members, themselves included, and in reciting these as they have been given me, I am not imagining little faults which do not occur, but those which the people themselves have declared to be in existence.

A common weakness among good people as well as others is fault-finding. One prominent journalist said he thought the whole city was glad to find something wrong on every occasion, and cited instances where his paper, sending out reporters for news, was constantly facing the fact that the reporters' definition of news was oftenest to get something that was going wrong, and emphasize the fact to the community, on the theory—which seemed to be borne out by the facts—that the readers in the city would gloat more or less over the fact of wrong-doing and be ready to condemn and find fault with anything that was not right, or with matters which were partly right and partly wrong; more rejoiced, however, to find something which needed to be smitten, than to find something which was worthy of praise.

THIS fault-finding, however, exists in petty ways through the lives of otherwise good people, to the spoiling of the vineyards of life. Most of us say we know some persons who are continually fault-finding. They remind us of Sheridan's "School for Scandal." No person is so good, no one is striving so hard to be good, that some evil thing cannot be said about him. Flaws are picked in the best things and the best people. The attitude of fault-finding, when it becomes chronic, is a cancer in the character; the bloom is rubbed off the fairest fruit and flower. In itself, it seems like a little fox; but multiplied by the increasing habit, it becomes an army that destroys.

It is well for us to take account of this habit if we have it even in the smallest degree, and root it out. There is a difference, of course, between honest, fair-minded criticism and what we call hateful or destructive criticism. Criticism is worth very little anywhere, whether it is in art or literature or in the rightful judgment of public conduct, unless it is made for the purpose of bettering conditions. No Christian ought to indulge in destructive criticism which does not have for its end the upbuilding of something. If a thing needs to be broken in pieces, let us break it, and then immediately construct something to take its place.

ANOTHER little fox that destroys the vineyards is the common habit among even Christian people of worry. Edward Everett Hale says, "Most people carry about with them three kinds of trouble; all they have ever had, all they are having now, and all they expect to have." George Macdonald says, "If you have a disagreeable duty to perform on Friday do not blacken the hours of Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday thinking about it." As long ago as Seneca lived, that wise old philosopher said, "Though sorrow must come, where is the advantage of rushing to meet it? It will be time enough to grieve when it comes. Meanwhile hope for better things." Whoever is Josh Wise says, "The man that has got troubles and the man that thinks he has are in the same fix." The Rev. Robert J. Burdette used to say: "There are two days about which nobody should ever worry, and these are yesterday and tomorrow." Honoré de Balzac, that wonderful delver into human passions and motives, who conceived a plan of fiction which was to embrace the whole range of human energy, said: "Feeble natures live in their sorrows, instead of converting them into apothegms of experience. To forget is the great secret of strong and creative existence. To forget after the manner of nature, which knows no past and begins again every hour the mysteries of her indefatigable productiveness."

Most of us know persons who have met with bereavement. Great and loving souls have gone out of our lives in the earthly existence. We treasure their memories, we are thankful for their participation with our struggles, and then we live continually in the atmosphere of our grief. There are Christian people who have lost their usefulness largely from the moment of some family bereavement. They have dropped out of the work of the church. They have ceased to take an interest in humanity. They revolve continually in the little circle of their own mourning. They have become tremendously selfish, instead of tremendously loving, out of an experience which was not intended to drive men and women back into the secret place of mourning, but to make their spirits more rich and more helpful on account of the trial which was meant to try them as gold is tried in the fire. Many and many a soul that has called Christ "Master" has made woeful mistake by nourishing a private grief to the rubbing out of a public service. This is to carry the habit of worry to the last extreme. It is one of the little foxes that gnaw at the tender buds of the life in the vineyard, and finally spoil it.

IT IS as possible for even a home to become a selfish little circle of private interests as it for a worldly organization, banded together for physical pleasure. A Christian, of all persons, needs to guard against this little fox. Here we have again our old friend Seneca, who was not what we call a Christian, saying, "No man can live happily who regards himself alone; who turns everything to his own advantage. Thou must live for another if thou wishest to live for thyself." Another philosopher has said: "A man who lives only with himself and for himself is apt to be corrupted by the company he keeps." President King of Oberlin says: "You can make no hopeful fight for your own character without beginning at once the service for others."

There is nothing in all the world which so broadens the mind and strengthens the heart and lifts up the soul as a universal sympathy. The church which has no use for foreign missions, which does not see across the ocean as well as across the street, the society which does not embrace in its creed the wide world, is living in a narrow and narrowing circle. The absence of this love of the multitude is one of the things that makes the church powerless, robs it of its enthusiasm, takes from it the great motive for saving men. If we could once capture the ability and the energy of the business men, there is nothing which we might not do with an organization which has the centuries behind it and Christ within it.

THERE is another little fox in many lives which otherwise would be great, the sensitiveness which takes offense, which says often among church members, like the little boy or girl, "I won't play any longer. I have been hurt in my feelings." One of the last things some people ever learn in the Christian life is to forgive an injury. There are good men and women who, if the crisis arose, would go to the stake and be burned for their faith, yet who will not forgive an unkind word and who cherish in their hearts for years some slight, real or supposed. These people are sensitive plants. I think they are greatly to be pitied. In a world which is so full of big things, it does not pay to linger over little ones, to let them worry or trouble or vex us.

Good Christian men and women who have beautiful qualities in other directions mar their whole lives and never seem to get any nearer the standard of Christ, on account of this one fault of quickness of temper in the face of wrong. I think myself the temperament which is so exceedingly sensitive that it cannot stand rebuke is to be pitied. But a Christian of all persons should learn to overcome. Jesus anticipated this when he said: "In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." He also anticipated this habit in men's lives when he said that we should forgive seventy times seven. How many of us, members of churches, have found it hard at times to forgive even once? This is one of the little foxes that spoil vineyard.

ANOTHER little fox is making things necess which are not necessities in life. That is, n nifying the unimportant things. It is indeed on the great problems of our existence to find out w the most important things of life are and do then the exclusion of the others; but our minds and he are often set upon what we call "things," and it is ceedingly difficult for us to set them aside and pu the place of mere "things" ideas or ideals, and to around them. Emerson was once sitting in study when a crank rushed in and said, "Mr. En son, do you know the world is speedily going to rui And the philosopher looked up from his work and sa "Well, I can get along without it." I do not kr why the Christian disciple cannot find out with aid of his Master what the great things of the Ki dom are and do them. When he does, he has disc ered the secret of life, and his soul is not posses with anxiety for things which do not themselves r resent realities.

Then there is the little fox of joylessness. It wo be difficult to say how many so-called Christian p ple lack the joyous spirit. They are good peop they perform their church duties with loyalty; th are faithful; they undoubtedly love their Lord a Master; they have great qualities of endurance; b when it comes to sheer happiness they are alm strangers to it. When trouble comes, they bear but with stoicism, not with joy. When grief com they endure it, but with the endurance of the Indi rather than the Christian. They do their work fait fully, but sing very little over it. What is known the joy of the Lord is an unknown quantity to the They have learned duty but not the joy of dut The little fox which is represented not by disconte or any of the positively disagreeable qualities, but the absence of a positive joy, is a little fox that spo the vineyard.

IT IS in the aggregation of these little faults in o Christian lives that we make the sum total of th destruction of the vineyards. One little fox in th vineyard might not matter; large numbers of them, they increase, finally spoil the vineyard. It is signi cant that in the American version there is a marke change in the interpretation. In the old version says, "Take us the little foxes that spoil the vines. In the new version it says, "Take us the little fox that spoil the vineyards." Vines here and ther might be spoiled, but the vineyard as a whole remai intact; but the thought is that the little foxes as the multiply spoil the whole vineyard. These little fault of which we have made mention today break dow the whole character. Instead of becoming filled wit Christian sweetness and helpfulness to the world, th life is spoiled throughout. We should guard ou vineyards from these faults. The deadly, insidiou poisons of the little wrongs and vices and sins of lif permeate character, destroy its usefulness and mak it unworthy of the divine purpose. God has given u a beautiful place for the planting of the vineyard o life, and has enriched the soil with the streams from his own never-failing springs, and has built about us safeguards of a civilization which contains all possibilities for protection, and has committed this vineyard of character, of richness, of sweetness, to our keeping. If, then, we carelessly or selfishly open places around this safeguarded vineyard for these enemies of the vine, what can we expect but the final spoiling of the vineyard? May it be our prayer today and every day to shut out these little enemies of our souls, to exclude them for the good of the wide world as well as for ourselves, and to grow daily in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Why should we have the same faults tomorrow that we have today? Why should we persist in allowing the same weakness of temperament to persist year after year and see no betterment when we have, as the source of our strength in overcoming, the Master of the universe himself to help us? I wish that we might all of us learn from this day what a wonderful thing it is to overcome. Let us not forget that He was tempted at all points like as we are. He will not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able, but will with the temptation provide a way of escape. Let us then grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, going on from perfection until at last we "attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

WHY WE DO NOT UNDERSTAND FRANCE

By Margaret E. Sangster

"I DON'T understand the French people," said the Captain as he sat down opposite me at the glittering little table. "I don't understand them—and I reckon I never will understand them!"

"You mean—?" I questioned.

"Did you see the girl who took my coat at the door?" returned the Captain—answering my question, in the good American fashion, with another question. "She asked me for a tip. I meant to give her one anyway, but it made me mad to have her ask for it. The waiters are the same way, and the taxi-drivers, and the bell boys, and even the ushers in the moving picture theaters. They're all out after the coin! It's just grab—grab—grab! That's what it is!"

"But the war has made such a difference," I argued. "Don't you suppose that——"

"I don't suppose anything," interrupted the Captain, "I know. They skin us right and left—all of them. The war has made a difference, you say? You bet it has! It's given them a new harvest of men with money. Did you see our waiters and taxi-drivers and ushers asking for tips when the French soldiers came to New York—did you? You bet you didn't! Why, those poilus could have had anything in town—if they'd expressed a slight desire for it. You didn't see our shopkeepers charging them two prices for anything! You didn't see our hotel clerks making them pay ten dollars a day for a two-dollar room. But that sort of thing is happening all over France. And it's wrong!"

"I'm sure—" I began weakly, "that you're wrong. The French are——"

"They are!" interrupted the Captain again. "They are! Here we've come over to help them fight their war. We didn't have any political reason of our own for butting in—you know that. We went in with clean ideals to fight for clean ideals. And now that it's over what are we getting? We're getting taken in on every side. That's gratitude, isn't it? That's——"

The waiter came up with the soup. I was glad. For with food in front of him your average man becomes more tolerant. The Captain began to smile again, as he raised his spoon to his lips.

"Anyway, they can cook!" he conceded.

FRANCE—so many of us don't understand France. We don't understand her manners or her methods, her ways of doing business or her ways of enjoying herself. I've heard many an American soldier say, all the way from a buck private to a colonel,

"I don't understand the Frogs. We don't even think alike!"

I came to France, myself, as a pilgrim goes upon a quest. I came to France looking for a country set high upon a throne of idealism—a country of soldiers that were gallant and fearless; of women who were each one of them a humanized Jeanne d'Arc. But when I landed in Paris I made many discoveries. I discovered that taxi-drivers were often discourteous, that waiters were often insolent, that baths and fresh air were hard to obtain. I found that every Frenchman was not a Foch or a Joffre—that few French women were at all like the immortal Jeanne. A week after my arrival in Paris I hated France, and spoke longingly of America as "God's country." After my second week—a nerve-racking week in which I battled with the French red tape of passport bureau and police carte d'identité, of bread tickets and no sugar and exorbitant prices—I hated France even more. It wasn't until I had been over seas for a month that I began again to love France.

With my other discoveries, upon arriving in Paris, had come the discovery that my schoolgirl French was quite inadequate. I could not make the French people understand when I spoke to them, and instead of blaming myself I was inclined to call them stupid. It was discouraging to speak in long, involved sentences and then to find out that those sentences meant nothing at all.

There were people that I wanted to talk with, too. There was the Frenchman in my hotel with the white hair and the ribbon of the Legion of Honor, there was the pretty girl with the auburn curls who sat at the table next to mine, and there was the little bell boy who chattered so ceaselessly. But I couldn't talk with them. And so I was quite prone to agree, at first, with any American soldier who said that the French people belonged to a different species.

I think that I got the key to the situation between the French and the Americans in France on a certain evening when a certain lieutenant was calling on me. We were sitting together in the tiny hotel living-room—a room crowded with French people, all busily talking. They were enjoying themselves, and so were we—but we weren't doing it together. There was a barrier between us.

"It's strange," said the lieutenant, voicing the thought that was in my mind. "Here we are, all fairly well-educated people of approximately the same class. We must have a great deal in common—we must be thinking approximately the same thoughts. And yet we have no common meeting-place. It's annoying! If ever I have any children they'll not be subjected to the embarrassment of knowing only one language!"

The barrier was the barrier of speech!

IS IT possible that we are at fault in this lack of racial understanding? Is it possible that we aren't big enough to understand? Is it possible that the French think that we are as queer as we think they are? Is it possible that they are saying, in their own tongue, "the Americans—they do not even think as we think"?

I've talked to a good many French people about it. And I've come to the conclusion that we're as much at fault as they are! We go gaily into Paris and—from the surface life of it—we form opinions that we put in an envelope labeled France. But Paris isn't France—any more than New York is America. We are overcharged by a jeweler on the Rue de la Paix and do not stop to consider that we would be doubtless just as thoroughly overcharged on our own Fifth Avenue. We shrug our shoulders at certain phases of French life—the French shrug their shoulders at our ways. And so it goes.

In Paris—yes, the taxi-drivers and the waiters and the ushers do ask for tips. And they are not pleasant if they don't receive those tips. And the fact grates upon an American with a wound stripe on his sleeve—a wound stripe that stands for a hurt received on some French battlefield.

But, after all, it's different from an American situation, this money situation in the cities of France. For going on five years there hasn't been much money spent in those cities, and the American soldiers are bewilderingly ready to spend money. Is it so strange that the shop-keepers should take advantage of this sudden avalanche of francs? Is it so strange that they should add to the prices? It's just the old law of supply and demand.

"They would spend it elsewhere," a little fruit-dealer told me—"why not 'ere?"

A great many people who write and talk convincingly about France never get far away from the French cities. And the boys who have been fighting with French troops—the boys who have been quartered with French families—aren't much on writing and talking. But when you question them they'll tell you that the French peasants are pleasant, hospitable, generous to a fault, and that the poilu is "a regular fellow—even if he is a Frog." They tell stories of a last crust shared willingly; of a warm bed and clothing given from a scanty store. They tell stories of motherly women who threw flowers in front of their dusty, marching feet in memory of some other boy who marched by on the same quest. And the fact that the same peasants sleep with their windows tight shut, and that there aren't many bathtubs to a village, doesn't register quite so hard as it did.

A MEMBER of the French legation spoke to me about the national feeling that has sprung up between France and America.

"Now that there is German propaganda on every side," he told me, "it is ver' necessary to keep beautiful the feeling between our two great nations. We must be brothairs! It must not be that you theenk of us as 'Frogs'! Yes, we know! You mus' not think that we would try to cheat in money matters. You must try to understand! If your boys of America could only speak our language it would be so easier. They would meet, then, the nice girls—they could go into the real homes. They could belong. Oh, it ees not fair that those who cannot know the real heart of a land—(an' who can understand the heart of France when her speach mean nothing?) should be the ones to form a national idea!"

It is necessary that France and America should be brothers. We who have sent our men to die on the battle grounds of France must realize that. We must realize that France is coming out of the chaos of war into the light of peace—that the time is one of enormous readjustments. And we must make allowances. We must realize that conditions on the Continent are not normal. And realizing that these conditions are not normal we must try to be tolerant and to say—"Perhaps the fault is mine," or "I wonder what the French think of us?" We must remember that the French are just coming out of a long and bitter fight for existence—a fight that we helped them win—and that they are dazed by the pain of the struggle.

The average American goes to France filled with the fire of idealism. And then, finding these abnormal conditions, he feels cheated and, consequently, hates France. But if he goes into the country places—if he meets the real people of France—he will come to love France again with a warm affection—not with the devotion of a fanatic who kneels before a shrine, but with a real brotherly feeling.

I went to Notre Dame one day at twilight time. The great church was hushed and still, and as I walked slowly toward the altar I felt strangely and completely at peace. The late sunset, slanting through the stained-glass windows, fell in golden bars across the floor and made brighter the gilt of the chancel rail. . . . Suddenly I knelt there, in the silence.

I did not see a little woman in black come softly in. I did not know that she knelt beside me; not for many minutes. But finally, when I lifted my head, I saw her there. And as I looked at her huddled little figure I knew that she was the real France—the France that has lost three millions of men—lost with a supreme patience and bravery, even with a wistful smile. I knew that, under the surface, all of France was typified in that one small kneeling figure.

I rose quietly to my feet. As I did so she raised her head and our eyes met. And we didn't need to speak the same language.

NOTRE DAME

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THROUGH colored glass, on burnished walls,
Soft as a psalm, the sunlight falls;
And, in the corners, cool and dim,
Its glow is like a vesper hymn.
And, arch by arch, the ceilings high
Rise like a hand stretched toward the sky
To touch God's hand. On every side
Is misty silence; and the wide
Untroubled spaces seem to tell
That Peace is come—and all is well!

A slender woman kneels in prayer;
The sunlight slants across her hair;
A pallid child in rusty black
Stands in the doorway, looking back. . . .
A poilu gropes (his eyes are wide)
Along the altar rail. The tide
Of war has cast him brokenly
Upon the shore of life. I see
A girl in costly furs, who cries
Against her muff; I see her rise
And hurry out. Two tourists pause
Beside the grated chancel doors,
To wonder and to speculate;
To stoop and read a carven date.

In uniform the nations come;
Their voices are a steady hum
Until they feel some subtle thrill
That makes them falter, holds them still—
Bronzed boys, who shrugged and laughed at death,
They stand today with indrawn breath,
Half mystified.
The colors steal
Into my heart, and I can feel
The rapture that the artists knew
Who, centuries before me, drew
Their very souls into the glass
Of every window. . . . Hours pass
Like beads of amber that are strung
Upon a rainbow, frail and young.

Through mellow glass, on hallowed walls,
The twilight, like faint music, falls;
And in each corner, cool and dim,
The music is a splendid hymn.
And, arch on arch, the ceilings high
Seem like a hand stretched toward the sky
To touch a Hand that clasped a Cross—
For France, new-risen from the loss,
And pain and fear of battle-hell,
Knows Peace, at last, and all is well!

Reaching the Common Conscience

WHEN President Wilson, speaking in Rome several months ago, told the Italian people that the only force that would bind the nations together is friendship, he stated a fact which has been repeatedly verified since. It is the business of the leaders in the Peace movement to organize the friendship of the world. Week after week the Conference strove and struggled through a mass of entanglements, peacewards. No progress could have been made unless there had been a genuine feeling of friendship among the Allies. It was the evidence of that feeling which attracted the large and small nations and raised the hopes of the peoples that justice would at last be done. And trouble has reigned wherever that confidence was not established.

Will the altruistic hope so widely proclaimed by the leading statesmen retain its hold upon the people of the different lands? In a recent address Premier David Lloyd George declared that "fair play to all classes, in every land," was essential to the saving of civilization. They must be made to feel that all are being treated with equal justice. Peace founded on any other basis would be a false peace. Fair play he regarded as the foundation of civilization, and if it were neglected now the whole structure would have to be built over again, from the bottom upward.

Fair play in the broadest sense, therefore, means moral, industrial, commercial house-cleaning on a large scale. It means the protection of those who need to be saved from exploitation; the lifting up of the down-trodden; the righting of long-established wrongs and injustices. Especially does it mean that those nations that are able to bear the burden of brotherly service in the great work of reconstruction should do so voluntarily and gladly.

This is the Golden Rule in practical application. The Church, which has proclaimed these principles from the beginning, has now the opportunity to emphasize and revitalize her teachings. She should speak to the universal conscience with courage and clearness and with an authority that cannot be misinterpreted. She should strive to eliminate hatred by teaching forgiveness. Her message should breathe the very spirit of Christ himself. The permanency of world peace will depend to a great extent on our spiritual attitude and convictions in the immediate future.

God has been very gracious to America in these trying times. We have suffered and sorrowed; but we can look back over those years of world struggle, feeling that we have followed the high, unselfish ideal faithfully. The world has acclaimed us as leaders in the earnest effort for a peace that is based on justice to all alike. We must still continue to strive for the triumph of those principles that have led us all through, giving them a wide application, so that they may win the support of the moral forces of all civilized people, and thus touch the common conscience of the world.

Undervaluing the Old Testament

PAUL, in advising his young and ardent disciple Timothy, held that every Scripture is profitable teaching, for correction, for reproof and for instruction in righteousness. That this conclusion has been shared by the vast majority of preachers and teachers of the Word in all generations will be readily conceded. From time to time questions have been raised as to the expediency of this or that book of the Bible for instruction, or as to the practical value of certain indicated narratives.

In the Thirty-fifth Congress of the Episcopal Church in New York last month, a discussion took place on the question whether the Old Testament should be retained in the Sunday schools for teaching purposes. Considerable difference of opinion was developed. One clergyman declared that most ministers of his acquaintance would not voluntarily take up certain portions of the Old Testament in the Sunday schools. The Creation story he denominated as simply "primitive science" and therefore misleading. The Old Testament, he said, contained much that was serviceable and more that was unserviceable in teaching. Another deprecated the doctrine of hate it presented. It is worthy of note, however, that the older members of the Congress—the ripest in Christian service and experience—were practically a unit in favor of the retention of the Old Testament studies.

This discussion is hardly a new development; it is a momentary revival of the old antagonism to a whole Bible. In the judgment of all the great Christian teachers, from apostolic times until today, the Old and New Testaments form a complete whole, each essential to the other. Jesus in his discourses showed his familiarity with the Old Testament, and set us a model as to its valuation. Thus it is that through his example, which has been followed by all faithful teachers ever since, none of the Bible can ever be regarded as obsolete. Many assaults have been made on the Book, which Gladstone called "the impregnable rock of Holy Scripture." This latest effort on the part of the younger element in the ministry to discredit the Old Testament for Sunday school purposes is too radical to be entertained by any Christian denomination. As far as the selection of topics for instruction is concerned, the simpler and more evangelical the choice the better. The rudiments of the first principles of religion for the young should be chosen with judgment, and the more solid food for full-grown men. This freedom of choice is always open to the Church.

Christendom will retain its Bible entire, and when the younger and more adventurous spirits of our budding theologians are matured and mellowed by experience, they will learn to agree with the wisdom of their seniors, who stand loyally by the old Book in its integrity.

New Life in the Country Church

DECLARING that there is a new ruralism, the outgrowth of new systems, new standards, new methods and processes, new aims and ideals, and a new agriculture based on applied mechanics, Dr. Garland A. Bricker, in "The Church in Rural America," not only pleads for a new church equal to the new opportunities and ready to supply spiritual vigor to the life of the reawakened country, but shows in twenty-seven chapters how it can be and is being done.

He shows that "a new agriculture has developed with the new industrialism," that "a new farm has been developed by the new agriculture," that "transportation facilities of a new type have annihilated distance," that "new transmitters of intelligence have become available," that "a new country has been developed," that "a new people has arisen," "a new spirit of cooperation is abroad," there are new aims and ideals, "a new life larger, stronger, more buoyant and richer than the old," and he declares: "The country church is about to cast off its old, heavy armor and put on the lighter, more peaceful and more truly serviceable robes of a new age." By this he does not mean a dilution of doctrine, but a faith idealized in community service that makes its influence felt in every avenue and angle of the new life of the new country. Dr. Bricker declares: "The Christian service of the Church must reach out from rural centers to the whole community population. The automobile drive, instead of the horse drive, must become the radius ot its circle of service. This will mean consolidation of churches of the same denomination and interdenominational cooperation. It will mean the renewed consecration of Christian farmers."

The book is a plea for a widening of the influence of the Church by bringing into touch with its life every worth-while interest of the rural community, and the chapters tell how to do it. It is not only a prophetic call to service; it is a handbook for servers. It is honest, does not blink facts, and does not gloss over ineffectiveness with sentiment, but it does point the way to action and results.

American civilization is built upon and around the Church. A hundred years ago, the people went to church, master, maid, child and servant; all sat under the preaching of the man of God. Today, the Church is going to the people. It is taking them education, inspiring their recreations, giving facilities for clean play, helping the bread-winner meet his problems and the homemaker hers; it has not ceased to bear the message of divine love and free salvation, but it has translated these into terms of loving service to the community. The city church and the country church have both found a wider life in a broadened ministry. The country church has become, besides a preaching-station, an agricultural experiment station, a community center, a public forum, the seven-day-a-week center of the neighborhood's life, and it is sowing more widely and reaping more richly for the Master than it ever did in the conservative days that are gone forever.

Is your church the vital center of your community life?

A Setback to Government Ownership

POSTMASTER-GENERAL BURLESON'S announcement returning the control of the ocean cables to the cable companies, and informing the public that the entire telegraph and telephone system will be restored to its former management as soo the necessary legislation can be had, surprises nob Whatever merits the system of public ownership have possessed, certainly these have not appe under his management. The government's con tion with the telegraph, telephone and cables has not only unsatisfactory, but the reverse of what been promised and what the public had been le expect.

For some time to come we may hear very little f any quarter in favor of government ownership. course, it will doubtless be contended by many tha other hands the experiment might have resulted q differently, and that increased rates and poor se would not have resulted; but the experience is tremely unfortunate, and coming at this partic time, the test will be accepted as conclusive.

Besides, we must not overlook the fact that President, watchful of events, had no doubt reac the conclusion that the experiment had scored a f ure, even before the recent Burleson episode in c nection with the suppression of the World's telegr called attention to it. It is surmised that Mr. Wil himself may have taken the initiative and authori the order for restoring the cable control, having come convinced that the wisest course would be end it. Left to the vision of Burleson, it might h gone on indefinitely until the protests of the pu would have shown the situation to be intolerable.

The Old Methods and the New

WE READ in the cable dispatches that it is improbable that the meeting for the forn inauguration of the League may be held Washington. The actual test of the value of League must come later, probably when the perm nent headquarters have been chosen and it is p pared for work.

There are those in different countries who ha criticized the League from the beginning and w have predicted its failure. Even now, some of t French journals practically intimate that the obj tions to the passage of the League covenant we voluntarily withdrawn for the reason that the Alli powers have understandings among themselves, a that secret alliances are by no means a thing of t past. Doubtless the League has its enemies in Euro as well as elsewhere; but we believe it has the hone and sincere support of those statesmen who have be giving it undivided study and consideration duri the last four months. And assuredly it has the co dial approval of all right-thinking people. The indu trial classes see in it the beginning of a new order things that is better than the old. Lovers of pea regard it as well-nigh heaven-sent to put an end to war It is only the few who still cling to the old aut cratic models who cannot comprehend that we a living in a different world from that of four years ag and that a new standard of values has been set up f human aims and conduct, individual and nationa The idea of world regeneration is too big for suc minds to grasp. They cannot believe that absolutis is dead and that the day of dynasties and autocra has passed away. It is their creed that human natu never changes, and that the world by and by will slid back to its old familiar conditions. They cannot se that the spirit of democracy is awake in every land and that the people are coming into their own.

Is Bolshevism Nearing Collapse?

WHAT are we to gather from the conflictin stories brought by the cables regarding th Bolshevists? One day we read that Lenin is leading a gay life at Moscow, living in a princel villa which he has fortified, giving magnificent dinners balls and fêtes, with a military band and actresse and dancers to amuse his guests, while yet he is i constant fear of his life and hardly dares to show himself in public without his bodyguard of Chinese. Th next, we learn that his armies in various parts of Russia are meeting defeat and have evacuated Petrograd, that the peasants are revolting by thousands, and that both Lenine and Trotzky are making secret arrangements with a view to boarding in some quiet hotel in one or other of the neutral countries. Which are we to believe? According to the judgment of some correspondents, the truth seems to lie between the two extremes. The Bolshevists see their power crumbling. Their terrorism has fed upon war, and they feel that when peace comes they will be better safely out of the way of the storm that will sweep over Russia. It looks as if they were getting ready to go while the going is good. Revulsion is liable to be more dangerous to them than revolution.

THE CONGRESS OF MOTHERS

THOUSANDS of mothers of America, united to promote child welfare, were brought together, through eir representatives, in biennial nvention at Kansas City, May -10, 1919.

The National Congress of Moth- s is a going group. The war found mobilized for effective service to ldier and sailor boys and to their others; and the end of the war ıds it up and ready for the next ing in home protection, which is e basis of world welfare, the key which is held by mothers.

It is a big program which the ational Congress of Mothers is nducting in its "Construction ork for 1919." This includes the back to school" drive; the war amp savings and thrift campaigns; "follow-up work" in child elfare; higher ideals of homeaking (especially in the homes of turned soldier boys); a "Victory" building in honor of soldier mothers; the roduction and transportation of food; a system of home and school education at will prevent war; a Home Education Division like that of the U. S. A. in the Educational Department of every nation round the world!

A Parents' and Teachers' Association in every school and a Parents' Association in every church for the greater realization of parental responsibility in child training and in impressing moral and spiritual truths is one of the admirable aims of the National Congress of Mothers, already successfully achieved in numberless localities.

To secure Bible and historical scenes in moving picture shows and to provide suitable resorts to take the place of the abolished liquor saloon is one of the commendable features of the organized mothers' work, which also embraces Americanization and many other phases of patriotic service.

During the past few years the Missouri State Congress of Mothers, which entertains the 1919 National Convention, has developed greatly, and it is expected by the leaders that the state will show the largest membership yet known in Missouri. In Kansas City there are 3,600 members enrolled.

The Grim Rebuilding of Aubréville

Quaint Relief Workers of the Quaker Faith Gathering Up Battered Human Remnants and Their Possessions

By HORACE B. DAVIS

Moving in supplies

Cleaning up wreckage

MADAME CRÉPIN rushed into the street of Vitry-le-Francois. She had seen Madame Drouard. She kissed Madame Drouard on both cheeks and asked her dozens of questions about their native village. She told about how she had left before the Germans came, and thought Madame Drouard had been very courageous to stay, even this long; and wasn't it fine to be repatriated?

Madame Drouard unpacked. "Look at that curtain," she said. "The Germans had wrapped up a piece of meat in it, and when they ate the meat they left the curtain on the ground. I picked it up and washed it."

Madame Crépin almost snatched it. She said, "That's my window curtain."

It is March; Madame Crépin is going back to her native village.

There may be a house in Aubréville which has not a hole through the roof or the wall; but it isn't near the main road. Aubréville might be a picturesque ruin in summer; in winter it is grotesque. It is not flattened out enough to be kept as a souvenir, like Ypres; it is not whole enough to be repaired; there is nothing unusually romantic about Aubréville in its present state to churn the imagination of those who search for thrills. Your eye follows staired bricks which mount to no conclusion; you see the sky through the windows; you examine the V-notch in the top of the lone factory chimney of the next village. It looks like the pictures; you are bored; you have been fed on horrors. Thank goodness the war's over, and you can forget about it. But it is March, and several hundred people are drawn toward Aubréville. You can't keep them away. Some are probably back already. The France of the interior and south will function even without the millions of wrecked lives which before the war helped in the work of the nation. When the big wheels get to turning smoothly we will probably see a thoroughgoing reconstruction. But Peace came suddenly and there is bound to be much gritting and squeaking before the machine can do its new work. It is obviously impossible for the French Government to take care of all the returning refugees before next winter.

Of course, they might stay where they are. For instance, Madame Hanen, from the Meurthe-et-Moselle, near Toul. She is tubercular and ought to leave Bar-le-Duc for a place in the south. But she will not go, since she would have to take her fourteen-year-old daughter away from a very satisfactory place with relatives in St. Dizier. Mme. Hauvry of St. Mihiel has been presented with a baby. Its mother is a friend; its father is a German. It neither walks nor talks. Mme. Henry was away from her home in Verdun when the 1916 offensive began; she has not gone back yet. Mme. Hougelot lived with her husband and four girls in a single room, containing one bed. She got clothes from a relief society for her children, until the relief society discovered that she was "a woman of very bad reputation." M. and Mme. Harmand have bought furniture and are living quite comfortably in a room with their two boys. The Herbillon family of Bar-le-Duc—M., Mme., and seven children—were not hurt in the air raid, but their house was smashed by a bomb. The Humbert family's farm was pillaged by French soldiers. I will not give the name of the family who insisted on living in a stable with the horses; they have since moved out. Two old maids "could not see well enough to sew, but earned a little by knitting socks for soldiers. Very depressed." Madame Gerard had to be evacuated from Belval because she insisted on selling drink to soldiers. A mother of nine children could speak only the German-Luxemburg dialect of the Thionville district, and did not dare to tell her story—hardly even to open her mouth.

A double bed in an only room sufficed for the couple Séez. When Monsieur died, Madame was not able to get him buried that day. She had her choice between sleeping on the floor and sleeping in the other half of the bed; and she chose the bed.

These notes are taken almost at random from the case papers of the Quaker relief worker. She knows all these people; they are not just "cases"; they are friends. She has talked over their problems with them and heard their stories, and parted them, the goats upon the left hand, and on the right those who buy at her store at three-quarters price. For buying is more satisfactory than giving, as she has discovered from experience.

And she knows that the hard times are not yet past. For Americans whose families are still whole, how easy it is to slide back into the old grooves! There was a man in the Marne who came and saw the ruins of his home and hanged himself.

To facilitate the return to Aubréville and Clermont and Varennes and the forty-odd villages round about, is the task of a little band of foreigners, English and American. This "Friends' Mission" is a body of people who know little about war and a great deal about French peasants of the northeast. Since December, 1914, their workers have sold or given clothes to the Harmand family, and supplied work to the two old maids; they have fed some fugitives from the fight, and brought away others in their automobiles; they have got in the crops and threshed them, repaired machinery and obtained materials for hundreds of struggling war-zone farmers, and have even induced a few farmers to cooperate with each other; they have received thousands of patients in their several hospitals—in one, an American surgeon performed a thousand operations in a year; in another, 850 babies were born, many of them little Rémois, that is, from Rheims; they have built hundreds of little houses—not supervised their building, but actually built them, and the houses, though small, are better than cellars or stables or the open sky; and from having met the multiplex problems of refugees they know where to push the hardest to get the best results.

The barbed-wire hasn't been wound up in part of the arrondissement of Verdun, and miles of trenches still remain to be filled in. There was a rumor that a hundred thousand German prisoners were coming to do it. Eventually it will be done. Then there will be another rumor that the government is coming to rebuild; and in the meantime many people will live in their cellars, as they did in the Marne in the early days of the war.

American soldiers have won glory in the Argonne. The English and American Friends are working in the Argonne, but their work is not glorious. It is just the same work they have been doing quietly since their respective countries went into the war. All they have to do is to pack up their cot beds and their woodworking machinery, and move north. No initial expenditure, no false starts or costly blunders; no hostility from the officials, who without known exception are keen to have them stay. They wish they could reconstruct the whole of France; but they have money and men for just one little region, west of Verdun: Clermont, and later Varennes.

They have not hated the Germans; only they have hated war; their God is not a fighting God, but one who aids sufferers. They have been working for peace, in their own way; they believe in mankind; they are trying to show that the spirit which takes away the occasion for war is an active spirit, which goes out to meet the enemy and turns him into a friend. They are hurrying, hurrying, and will hurry nervously for months; for before next winter there is work to be done at Aubréville.

BIRDS AND THE HARVEST

By B. S BOWDISH

Secretary, New Jersey Audubon Society

The Bluebird is a friendly fellow

"OH, WHAT shall the harvest be?" Perhaps we might get a "little bird to tell us," or if not exactly that, at least we could base a general answer in considerable part on conditions of bird life where the seed was sown and the harvest reaped.

In the early days, the days before we had scientific study of the habits of birds, the connection in the popular mind between birds and the sowing of seed principally took the form of speculation as to what proportion of the sown seed or its product the birds would get. Crows and blackbirds were observed to pull corn. The fact that some kernels were left in the hill uneaten did not suggest to the farmer that it was the cutworm that the crows were really after, not the corn.

More than once the meadowlarks in the grass and grain fields have been the objects of suspicion and aversion on the part of the mistaken farmer. It was not suspected that of the meadowlark's food nearly ninety-nine per cent. in summer consists of insects, while in fall and winter many weed seeds are eaten. Grasshoppers eat several times their own weight in hay or grain daily, while a meadowlark has been found to consume as many as thirty-seven of these insects at a meal.

An investigator noticed rose-breasted grosbeaks visiting his pea vines and shot and examined one of the birds. The stomach held one large green caterpillar, several potato beetles and a few fragments of peas. The observer's conclusion was that the few peas taken had been well paid for. A single pair of grosbeaks, with their young, have been known to keep a potato patch free of the destructive beetles throughout the season. What shall the harvest be—with and without these birds?

When Professor C. F. Hodge, of Clark University, Worcester, Massachusetts, was breeding in captivity quail or bobwhites, he became convinced that their food habits made them most valuable assistants to the farmer. Professor Hodge's little daughter had a half-grown bobwhite which was a special pet, and this bird was called upon to stage a demonstration. He offered his little daughter a dollar if she would test her pet bobwhite's capacity as a destroyer of rose slugs. The little girl enlisted her brother's aid. In little tin cups they caught the rose slugs, counted them out in lots of one hundred each, and fed them to the young bobwhite. That evening Professor Hodge received his daughter's report—1,186 rose slugs converted into the upbuilding of one young bobwhite!

From 75 to over 100 potato beetles have been found in a single bobwhite stomach; 29 of these birds were found to have eaten 539 locusts, an average of over 25 each; one stomach contained 1,500 weed seeds; another 3,000, a third 10,000 pigweed seeds. The weeds that choke the crops figure quite largely in the question, "What shall the harvest be?"

THE birds of prey are actually the farmer's best protection against mice and other rodents. Misplaced censure has more than once been crystallized in legislation. Pennsylvania in 1885 enacted a law providing a bounty on the scalps of hawks and owls. In two years 180,000 scalps were turned in and the state paid out $90,000 for them. The loss to the farmers of the state through the depredations of rodents that might reasonably be expected to have been the natural prey of the 180,000 hawks and owls was estimated at over a million dollars! The law was repealed, but it was many a year before Pennsylvania recovered from the blighting effect of this wholesale slaughter of her winged policemen.

While most of the common birds eat a great variety of insects or weed seeds, or often both, in many instances species have their special favorites. One of the illustrations of this is the fondness of cuckoos for hairy caterpillars. One bird has been found to have eaten as many as 250 fall webworms at one time, and cuckoos which had gorged themselves have still continued to pluck the caterpillars from their web, crush the insects, and drop the lifeless bodies to the ground.

Orioles are able seconds in the destruction of caterpillars. Vireos and warblers consume great numbers of the smaller caterpillars. Mr. E. H. Forbush, State Ornithologist of Massachusetts, thinks that the cedar waxwing might appropriately be termed "cankerworm bird." One of the waxwing's records is 100 cankerworms as a meal of one bird.

AMONG its various insect diet, including many destructive species, the scarlet tanager numbers the dreaded gypsy moth. A tanager has been observed to eat 630 of these caterpillars in eighteen minutes.

Blackbirds have been known to fly at least half a mile to an orchard infested with cankerworms. They also eat gypsy moths, forest tent caterpillars and other hairy larvæ. They rank among the best destroyers of weevils, click beetles, wireworms, grasshoppers, ants, bugs and flies. In fall, winter and spring, they eat quantities of weed seed.

Many members of our native sparrow tribe are largely insectivorous in summer. Others that come to us for the winter from a more northern summer home depend almost entirely on weed seeds. Our common little chipping sparrow, one of our nearest feathered neighbors, nesting in the bushes of our dooryard or the vines upon our porch, is exceedingly valuable as a destroyer of cankerworms, tent caterpillars, the larvæ of browntail, gipsy and tussock moths, and many other pests.

In forty minutes a Maryland yellowthroat consumed 3,500 plant lice. Four chickadees were found to have eaten cankerworm moths containing eggs, which, based on a count of twenty of the moths, were estimated to number 19,425.

No one could desire more attractive or valuable neighbors than the bluebird or house wren, willing to respond quickly to the invitation of a bird house placed their occupancy. Grasshoppers constitute twe two per cent. of the bluebird's food for the e year, sixty per cent. of it for August and Septem The house wren will raise two or possibly three broods in a season. This means the very con tration of activity in seeking a great variety insect food for the many hungry mouths. No be assets were possessed by any of the effective gardens than an occupied bird house or two in t midst.

This young Meadowlark has an insatiable appeti for insects

During the settlement of the Mississippi val great swarms of locusts appeared, devouring newly planted crops. From the tiny kinglet to great whooping crane, the birds turned to and fed these insects. "Fish-eating birds like the great heron, flesh-eating birds like the hawks and owls, s birds, ducks, geese and gulls, all joined with smaller land birds in the general feast."

A few years ago we had the estimate of $800,000, annual loss to forestry and agriculture in the Uni States through the depredations of insect and rod pests. Last summer, when Congress was asked pass the enabling act giving effect to the treaty w Canada for the protection of migratory game and sectivorous birds, there was laid before that body mass of data showing the loss, direct and indire through such causes, of a billion and a half doll annually.

Examination of hundreds of stomachs of bir taken in different localities and at all seasons, pai taking scientific observations of the birds' habits trained experts, have now for many years be establishing beyond question the fact that they one of Nature's most effective checks on the und increase of insect and rodent pests. No very profou logic is required to draw the conclusion that a mark increase in bird life, and particularly when attract about the farms and gardens, can reasonably expected to be followed by a reduction in pests and their injurious work. At this time, when for so period at least the obligation falls on this country assume the rôle of granary and food storehouse for great part of the world, in view of the facts of whi the foregoing is the most cursory of glances, are we justified in asking in profound seriousness of our bi neighbors, "What shall the harvest be?"

LABOR AND PEACE

By WILLIAM B. WILSON

Secretary of Labor

THERE is a great deal of history to be noted in connection with readjustment. We are going through the same kind of atmosphere we went through at the time we entered the ar. At that time there was a feeling that would not be able to organize an army st enough to be of any assistance, that could not train an army quickly enough, at we could not transport the army to urope because there was no shipping, and at we could not equip the army, even if were able to train it and transport it.

And yet, when the supreme crisis came, hen the Huns had broken through the ies on the western front, and nothing reained between them and Paris but thirty iles of space, it was these same boys, hom some of our people said we could not ain, transport or equip, who stepped into e breach at Château-Thierry, stemmed e tide of the oncoming Huns and hurled em back toward Berlin, where they were ept going until the climax came. The me spirit that dominated the American ople at that time concerning the conduct the war will thrill them during the period reconstruction.

The path of industrial reconstruction lies ear before us. We have practically all the w materials we need, and the markets of e world are now open to us. The acute roblem with which we have to deal is that demobilizing our army, our navy and our dustrial war workers, and reestablishing urselves on a normal post-war basis. Now at might be a very easy thing to do if very man engaged in business in the nited States were filled with the idea that e should get going at once, and keep his rganization on at least as large and effecive a basis as it was on before the war. here are many business men who feel that is not wise from a financial viewpoint to o that; that the war cost of labor is out of he question, and that business should wait ntil the price of material and of labor goes down, lest those who go ahead now lace themselves at a disadvantage as compared with their rivals who hold off. his reasoning seems fairly sound, but it is only a phase of the situation. My ision is that there will not be more than four to six months at the most of interim etween the signing of the peace treaty and our getting into the regular, postar swing; and the reasons which have brought me to that conclusion are everal.

In the first place, in nearly all lines of industry and commerce there has been a depletion of stocks, except those closely related to supplies for military purposes. Then, again, the supply of labor is not so ample as many are prone to think when they examine the question offhand. Since the beginning of the war there has been a shortage in immigration of 3,200,000 persons. We have 500,000 persons engaged in shipbuilding, and they will likely continue in that occupation for some time. As for the men taken for the army, the best we can hope for is that 300,000 of them will be demobilized by the end of the calendar year. So there will be several million fewer workers than the normal supply. There may even be an increase in the demand for labor, because our workers and farmers received higher wages during the war and have laid by a surplus. With the relaxation of the war restrictions on production of non-essentials, there is released this great purchasing power in the hands of the workingmen. There is also a great opportunity for trade opened up with the South American countries, and with France and Belgium.

With these things before us, if we can tide ourselves over the brief period of readjustment, we have from eight to ten years of industrial activity ahead of us equal to anything we have ever had in the past. Our greatest difficulty is the tiding over of the few months of transition.

The labor organizations are in a better position to resist a lowering of wages than they ever have been before. With the reserve in their hands to which I have referred, the workers are in a position to resist, and I fear that if any attempt is made to force down wages to any considerable extent, there will be a resistance long enough to prevent its accomplishment.

To me it is a short-sighted policy on the part of the business man to run the chance of destroying his industrial or commercial organization for the opportunity of a brief period of lower wages and cheaper material. With the expansion that I have referred to in prospect, there will be greater demands for labor, and that means that the industry or commercial establishment that has not maintained its organization in the interim will be at a disadvantage during the period of labor competition.

My appeal to all of the people is: "Get your business going and keep it going."

Do You Know a Good Place for a Returning Soldier?

GENERALS of every nation have voiced, in no uncertain language, opinions of American manhood in saying, "There never was a finer set of men than the American soldiers and sailors."

These boys are through soldiering now and want to get to work, in factories, in offices and on the farm. Every employer requiring from one to 100, or even 1,000, will find it a big advantage to list his requirements with the Christian Herald.

What better friend could any one be to our returning soldier than the person who will make it possible for him to secure immediate employment—or, better still, help him to find a suitable farm or other good business opportunity?

One Christian Herald reader who offers a Kentucky farm, needing development, at nominal rent, will get a good tenant and at the same time a hero of the Argonne Wood will get just the chance he has wanted.

Another Christian Herald reader writes that several soldiers can be well placed in his community. "Send me one at once and I will use him right," he adds.

Still another offers "a seven-acre place, well located, well watered, with good buildings and splendid for a poultry farm."

These are but a few samples of the many opportunities which our readers may have to offer.

The Christian Herald is prepared to take care of all requirements promptly. We are directly cooperating with the United States Employment Service, but giving especial care as to the exceptional character of the men supplied.

Many of the returning soldiers are seeking other occupations than farming. Do you know of any opening at all for a good man in your community? If so, let us hear about it at once.

It is, of course, the more enterprising and ambitious of the returning soldiers who are seeking new and better positions in life than they held before the war. They are of the class of young men who make valuable additions to the solid and progressive citizenship of the community. Their deeds and conduct in the service of the country speak volumes for the individual intelligence, alertness, and training of the flower of American manhood who went forth to war. When you get one of these you are getting a real MAN.

The Return of the Armenians

THE Armenians are coming up from the Mesopotamian desert once more to seek their homes in Turkish Armenia. Four years ago the Turks drove hem from comfortable firesides into the rackless waste of an inhospitable desert. Thousands died on the way from inhuman reatment and starvation.

For almost a year and a half the eportations and massacres continued, until Turkish Armenia was practically rid of the Armenain population, as the powers at Constantinople had planned. In the prisons of Diarbekir alone, 16,000 Armenians had their throats cut. During massacres at Benia, Adiaman and Selefka, not a male over thirteen was spared. All the men were shot down outside of eighty villages near Lake Van; 120,000 Armenians were killed in this district, according to the Turkish Government statistics. The once beautiful region between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers has become the sepulcher of thousands of Armenians.

The Turks could not kill all the Armenians, but they could rid the country of them. They set about it systematically. Often after one hour's notice the Armenian population of a village would be hustled out to join the ever increasing numbers of the convoys traveling toward the deserts. They did not know where they were going, but the Turks promised that a new agricultural settlement would be founded somewhere far from their old homes.

Two places had been selected for the final dénouement of the Armenian tragedy. One was Sultanieh, a village ot the Konia district in the center of Anatolia —a wilderness leading to a barren desert. The greater number of Armenians were sent on a longer journey to Aleppo, for dispersal among the Arabian provinces beyond. A violent climatic change occurs at this point, and the torrid climate and malarial swamps were one more agony added to the woes of the deported Armenians. Thousands of Armenians died on the way to the fever-ridden, hunger-stricken settlement camps. They were attacked by raiding Bedouins and Kurds, while the Turks took every opportunity to deplete the ranks as far as possible by starvation, ill-treatment and outright murder.

It was a miserable life, that of the Armenians who survived the long journey and reached the "settlements," where no food, implements nor seed for the "agricultural colony" had been provided. Somehow through the months the Armenians eked out a pitiful existence. Now the sad remnant is coming back toward their old homes. In groups of twos and threes they come, often joining other weary refugees plodding back over the burning sands—ragged, thin, skeletons of their former selves.

The relief workers from America and England have established soup and bread kitchens in many cities and towns along the routes of the returning Armenians. Here the hungry refugees may obtain some food each day and medical aid if a physician is present. Here also are gathered permanently many thousands of orphans who have n parents to take them back to their homes. In Beirut alone, 30,000 refu are being helped every day, and 18, orphans are entirely supported in orpha ages.

Three million Armenians are living a scattered life far from their homes, but are longing for the day when they will be permitted to start life anew in the land rightfully belonging to them. In the Caucasus where 700,000 Armenian refugees are gathered there is great suffering.

Near the coast in Asia Minor the Armenians are again entering their ruined home towns, where desolation followed in the wake of Turkish warfare. Barren hillsides and dead ruins, among which not a living thing moves, are sights which greet the travel-worn refugees after they have braved the terrors of the long journey back through the scorching deserts.

In their extremity the Armenians are appealing once more to America for aid. It gives us another task besides the immediate ones of clothing and feeding the refugees. We must help rebuild the homes, and enable the Armenians to start once more in commercial, educational and intellectual life, in which they have always excelled when allowed to progress without interference from their Turkish oppressors.

Four hundred relief workers and four cargo ships, lent by the United States Government, have been sent out by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief and are now relieving the distress of thousands of poor refugees in the Near East. More supplies, including garden tools, seeds and building materials for homes and farms, must follow. It is for this the Committee has named May 10 to May 20 as the time for the drive which will endeavor to have each county in the country reach its quota. The $30 000,000 sought is the minimum amount needed to carry on this great work. About $22,000,000 have been subscribed thus far.

A GOOD WORD FOR MEXICO

By SAMUEL GUY INMAN

Secretary of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America

MEXICO once again occupies the front pages of the newspapers and the demand by certain interests for intervention is becoming more and more insistent. Why? We are told that American property is being confiscated, American citizens are persecuted and killed, and the country is in an absolutely chaotic condition.

I have just returned from a visit to Mexico and feel as an American citizen it is my duty to let my fellow Americans know of the evidences of new life and improved conditions found there.

The first thing that impresses one is the fact that daily trains are running on practically every railroad in Mexico. Arriving at Laredo, Texas, at 8 A. M., by hurrying through one is able to have his passports viséed on the American side and to take an automobile across the wagon bridge to Nuevo Laredo, have his baggage inspected some five times by different officials, then fumigated (which meant only that a bulb of chemicals was squeezed at the closed valises), and catch a southbound train at 11 A.M. The trip to Monterey, about 160 miles, was made by 4 P.M., the quickest time I remember to have experienced on this run.

Monterey still shows some results of the terrible battle of 1914, especially noticeable in a number of burnt buildings, including the fine railroad station. Instead of the 4,000 Americans who lived in Monterey some ten years ago, there are now estimated to be about 500 who live in and around the city. These are largely employed by the smelters, the steel plant, the mines, and a few in commercial business.

There is a splendid foreign club, where one can meet the French, English and American colony and get their opinions concerning the condition of things in Mexico. No one here, not even the most pessimistic, seems to believe that there is any movement against the present government that is strong enough to upset it. There are various bands of bandits operating in different sections of the country, but they have no political program, desiring only to loot. Carranza will undoubtedly complete his term, and the candidates for the presidency are already announcing themselves, although it is nearly two years before the election will take place. The greatest political abuses are now committed by the innumerable "generals" of the army. Not even the government itself, it is said, knows how many of these "generals" there are. A series of editorials is now appearing in a Monterey paper concerning the necessity of sending these "generals" out to fight, instead of allowing them to parade around in automobiles in the cities, spending the people's money.

MONTEREY, being very close to the border, and with a large American colony, has always had a strong American flavor, with the "gringos" very popular. The English, French and American colonies have been united very closely during the war and have fought together for Allied sentiment against the strongly organized German propaganda. Some of the most important merchants of Monterey are Germans, and they have always wielded a wide influence. The president of the Young Men's Christian Association, before America entered the war, was a prominent German merchant, but he was immediately forced to retire. The Allied colonies have opened a reading-room on the main plaza of the city, which has done a magnificent work. Every time I visited it it was full of interested readers. The walls are lined with some of our most beautiful American and French posters. Three Monterey papers have been subsidized by this same organization, and the people here have pretty thoroughly understood the Allied cause all during the war. The Committee on Public Information has opened such reading-rooms in Mexico City and other centers, and has seen to it that the Mexican people thoroughly understand how complete has been the Allied victory. As they have learned of the idealism and power of the United States their respect has greatly increased.

Going on down into the republic, the following questions have suggested themselves as among the most interesting for investigation on this trip: What are the Mexican people now thinking about? What does the present economic, political and educational situation promise for the future of Mexico? How are the Americans in Mexico treated and regarded? What are the relations between the governments of the United States and Mexico?

Six leaders in the new life of Mexico. First to the left, Director of the daily paper, organ of the government (a former Protestant minister). 2. Director for the Secondary Instruction for the Federal District (a son of a Protestant minister). 3. Director of the National University. 4. The Director of the National Preparatory School (an earnest Protestant Christian). 5. Secretary of the National University (a former Protestant minister). 6. The young Director of the Primary Schools of Mexico City

As to what the people are thinking, it seems to me that the most encouraging thing—which is very evident on all sides—is a realization that Mexico has been entirely too nationalistic, too self-satisfied, too afraid of foreign influences, and that her future largely depends on her reaching out to the world and bringing to Mexico the lessons of the most progressive nations.

At Monterey I found the newspapers published editorials running something like this: "We must realize that Mexico needs to understand the United States. We must live as next-door neighbors to that country, whether we like it or not, so we must find out how we can live in a friendly way. We should not live back in 1847. Those days are past and we must face up to the problems of 1919." Similar expressions from the press, government officials and the mass of the people came to me as I proceeded on.

IN MEXICO CITY I was asked to spe the famous National Preparatory Sc from which many of Mexico's famous have graduated. I faced an audience of than seven hundred young people in magnificent assembly hall of that fine his old building. They told me that two years they did not dare bring together the stud in any kind of an assembly, so lacking were the discipline and respect for authority. This sho itself especially in their hatred of foreigners, ticularly North Americans. This had been notable that four fellow countrymen who acc panied me suggested that they had better not on the platform. We were all given, however distinct ovation.

In my address I spoke of the fact that we were i new day; referred to an old prophecy that the would come when there would be "no more se and that we had practically arrived at the time wh the angry waves that separate the nations of earth no longer exist; that the Germans had thou that because of the sea the United States could se no soldiers to help fight for the world's freedom, b that we had bridged the sea and sent fifty thousa a hundred thousand, two hundred thousand, th hundred thousand soldiers a month "over there that our President had gone over this bridge i France and taken part for a few days in the Pea Conference, and returned to Washington for a f days and then planned to go back to Paris f another short stay; that it would n be long until these same young Me cans would be taking an airpla from Vera Cruz and flying ov to Paris in a few hours; so tha after all, there was no sea, no mo barriers between the nations, an Mexico, as other countries, should n seek to live by itself. This sentime and the name of Wilson were greete with such hearty demonstrations th they could only be stopped by the D rector's calling on them to sing th national hymn as a symbol of the salutations which were to be taken t the students of America.

FROM the National Preparator School I went to attend a banque celebrating the thirty-second anni versary of the founding of the Norma School of the Federal District. I sa down with six hundred teachers—al normal graduates—and, after partaking of a sumptuous repast served in the immense corridors of the Normal School, listened to the toasts from various educational leaders. Some of these were very critical of the educational system of Mexico in the past, others explained how they could do things better in the future, and one took as his theme the necessity of all taking as their model the Great Teacher, Jesus of Nazareth. Altogether it was a very happy occasion, not lacking, however, in its realization of problems that were before the people and intimating that the teachers were facing these problems as were probably no other class of people.

From there I visited the National University, the secretary of which is a former Protestant minister. They were so anxious to show their cordiality to the American visitor that they presented him with some eight volumes of rare publications, including two large albums of colored plates of Aztec picture-writings, which would make collectors of rare manuscripts turn green with envy.

You will want to know if President Carranza, who has been working on a platform of "Mexico for the Mexicans," as opposed to the liberal concessions to foreigners by Diaz, is equally cordial to Americans.

ak I am in a pecu- y fortunate position to speak on the ect.

y relationship with r Carranza began n he came to the rnational boundary to meet Don Fran-) Madero, who was ing his triumphal y into Mexico after revolution had been . When I saw these men embrace, I d not help wishing the big, stalwart, -poised man of logic, ead of the little, ex- ble man of vision, going to the capital to direct the affairs of the on.

t this time he visited the People's Institute, of ch I was director, and, on being told by the presi- te municipal that all those leading men in the ocratic life of the district had been previously ned in the debating club, the lecture courses, or night classes of the Institute, he became inter- d in the multiplying of such institutions, and said t if twenty-five of these could be established over xico revolutions would soon be a thing of the past. s the basis of our friendship was our common in- st in this kind of education, and not in any way tical, I feel that I knew the real man, especially ing the time he was working out the problems of governorship of Coahuila. I never saw a man er into the hard task of bettering labor conditions, alizing taxation, and extending the educationa k of his state with more enthusiasm and appar- ly with a greater desire to serve his people. Sev- l times he mentioned to me that he had been called Mexico City by the Madero government, but said t his greatest ambition was to work out the prob- s of his own state, and that only the direst neces- would cause him to abandon his work as governor any other position. I would say that it was a at disappointment when he was compelled to ndon these administrative reforms to take up the ies of a soldier.

WHEN Madero was murdered and Señor Carranza became the head of the revolutionary vement, he had his headquarters for six months posite my residence. I saw him practically every , and knew the group of young men whom he hered around him. His family and mine visited k and forth, and when conditions became so dan- ous in Mexico that it was no longer safe for his ily to be there it was our privilege to take them oss the international boundary and to witness the parting scene between the man who was leaving for front and his wife and daughters, who were fleeing safety in the other direction.

I had an interview with the President in the tional Palace on my last trip which gave me ewed confidence in him. The following are his significant words concerning relations between our two countries:

"I shall be grateful to you if you will make it clear that there is absolutely no persecution of Americans in Mexico; that both our government and our people are desirous of giving the Americans the same fair treatment we endeavor to accord to all foreigners; that, while it is not always possible to guarantee the safety of every individual—be he a foreigner or Mexican—we are making every effort to give protection to all.

"As you have traveled in all parts of the republic, have you seen any indication that the Americans are treated differently from other people, that they are persecuted, that they are not received with cordiality by government officials and the people generally? We deeply appreciate what some Americans are doing to inform the people of the United States concerning actual conditions in Mexico, but notwithstanding these efforts there seems to be, on the other hand, an organized propaganda in the United States to depreciate the Mexican government and people, by making Americans think that their fellow citizens are ill-treated in Mexico and are not wanted there.

"The other matter which I would like to have you make clear to the American people is the actual conditions found in Mexico today. As you travel, you no doubt find a great difference between conditions now and two years ago, when you last visited us. You see improved economic conditions, less evidence of military rule, more schools, and new life developing everywhere. Go to the theaters—they are full; go to our moving picture shows—you hardly find a vacant seat; look at our automobile taxi service—you will find it one of the finest anywhere, with hundreds of new machines in our streets. Prices are not exorbitant, schools are open and functioning. Some of the best minds Mexico has produced, both young men and those connected with education for many years, are giving themselves to solving the difficult educational problems. Trains are running on practically all lines; crops are more universally planted than for a long time. Now these are things we should like the people of the United States to know. We do not want fulsome praise nor any one to shut his eyes to the fact that all problems are not solved. We do not ask favors, we simply ask that the truth in fairness be known.

"There is no real reason that I know of why your people and mine cannot get along together. There are problems to be faced, but they are not insurmountable if we work honestly together for their solution. The establishment of an outstanding educational institution in the City of Mexico, along the lines you have mentioned, backed by Mexico's friends in the United States, would no doubt be one of the best ways to contribute toward a mutual understanding."

I CANNOT better close this article than by quoting the resolution passed by the Conference of Christian Workers (the far-reaching program of which will be the subject of the next article) concerning their estimate of the present situation in Mexico:

"The Conference of Christian Workers, meeting in the City of Mexico, February 17 to 22, 1919, wishes to express deep gratitude for the cordial way in which it has been received by all the people and for the fact that improved conditions and the open-mindedness of the people permit Christian work to be carried on in all parts of the republic, with protection and welcome for the workers.

"The twenty delegates from the United States, before arriving at the capital, have visited their work in all sections of the country, the routes of some being through Nogales, Sonora, Sinaloa and Guadalajara; others through El Paso, Chihuahua, Zacatecas and Aguas Calientes; others through Laredo, Monterey and Saltillo; others through Matamoros, Victoria, Tampico, and San Luis Potosi, and others through Vera Cruz, Jalapa and Puebla. Such travel has been attended with no untoward incident whatever, and with a far greater degree of comfort than was anticipated.

The Blazing of the Rainbow Trail

MAY is the anniversary month of the departure, one hundred and fifteen years ago, of the heroic band of adventurers at left the mouth of the Missouri River to cover and explore the vast unknown realm of in, mountain, river and forest extending m the Mississippi to the Pacific.

Meriwether Lewis and William Clark, two ung army officers from the gallant state of rginia, were chosen to lead the expedition at was to become the "epic of American ex- ration."

From a camp near St. Louis, the "party of orthwest discovery" set out on the fourteenth May, 1804. About six months later they ached the villages of the Mandan Indians, in e territory we now call North Dakota. There ey attached to their company a French Cana- an trapper and his Indian girl-wife, Toussaint haboneau and Sacagawea, who went along the following spring as interpreters to the ibes of native Americans whose goodwill it was rt of the explorers' mission to gain.

Thousands of miles of the most difficult sort travel lay ahead of the party of thirty-two rsons that left the Mandans in April, 1805. he Rockies were traversed by white men for e first time within the present bounds of the nited States; the headwaters of mighty rivers were aced; savage tribes were met and conciliated; hith- to unknown animals were discovered. At last, in vember, 1805, Captains Lewis and Clark brought eir valiant command in sight of the Pacific Ocean, hich they had traveled so far and so perilously to see.

The explorers pushed their conquering way through ok-torn passes; they discovered rivers that they amed for friends and government officers; they made tes on natural wonders that they were the first of ir race to see; they remarked the advantages of certain sites for trading-stations that in our day hum with commerce; and after many hundred miles of hard traveling they attained the lofty ridge-pole of the continent. Horses were secured for the final lap of the mountain journey through the influence of Sacagawea, who was overjoyed to find when they arrived in the country of the Shoshones that her own brother, Cameahwait, was the chief. By the end of August the party had acquired thirty horses and were ready to resume the journey across the mountains to the Columbia. Often a place for the horses' hoofs had to be cut out of the rock, and sometimes, the way proving too narrow, the burden-bearers fell over the edge of steep cliffs with their heavy loads. Even when the other side of the Rockies was reached, perils did not end. Game became scarce; horses and dogs were slain for meat. Some of the men fell ill from enforced fasting and the rigors of the march. On reaching the forks of the Snake River, canoes were built for the journey down the Columbia River to the sea. The rapids of the Snake, the Lewis and the Columbia frequently interrupted progress. At last—welcome sight—they met an Indian wearing a sailor's hat and blue blouse, and knew that salt water was not far off. Tidewater was noted on the second of November. Five days later Lewis recorded "the delightful prospect of the ocean—that ocean, the object of all our labors, the reward of all our anxieties."

The Rainbow Trail today. The Columbia Boulevard is the finest scenic highway in the world

The winter was passed within the pickets of a crude stronghold a few miles south of the estuary of the Columbia River, on the Pacific coast.

The company had scarcely reached St. Louis, September 23, 1806, when traders began to set their faces westward. Another fifty years, and the wagons of the pioneers were creaking across the sun-scorched prairies, tumultuous river courses and forbidding heights first braved by the expedition led by Lewis and Clark. Today, thronged highroads of commerce link countless towns and cities in the rich realm beyond the Mississippi. Fields of gold carpet the plains so wearily crossed by the explorers, and acres of fruit trees bend their weighted branches beneath the Western sun.

The enterprise that bears the name of Lewis and Clark stands alone among our tales of national heroism. In the journals that recount their achievements we may read the boldest sagas of American exploration.

THE SACRIFICE HIT

A Baseball Story in Which a Men's Club Wins Its Point by Losing a Game

By GEORGE GILBERT

Author of “King of the Shillibers,” “Too Much Elnathan,” “A Prophet Not Without Honor” and “One Thousand Poods”

“YAH! Yah!! Mind yer own biz'nez.”

So Pug Wilclox yelled at Rev. Frank Turnbull.

The pastor, from the fence of the big pasture lot on the side hill overlooking Arvallon, had been watching the toughest and noisiest of the young men who worked in Mill No. 8, Bloxhame Steel Works, play baseball. It was Sunday afternoon, and the pastor, his morning services ended, his dinner eaten, was taking his customary stroll, something he did when he was pondering on his theme for the evening—putting the finishing touches on it before its delivery. The noise, the oaths, the persistence of these young fellows in Sabbath-breaking had impelled Turnbull to make a protest anew. He had spoken to them several times earlier in his ministry there. While they had listened with outward respect, they had resumed their playing as soon as he had gone. But this time, speaking while they were in the heat of a warm contest with the picked nine from Mill 9, they had shown open resentment, culminating in Wilclox's yell.

Turnbull realized that he could appeal to the law and run the chance of securing a verdict against the disturbers in a trial, but it would be a jury trial, for the young men would appeal for such a trial, and there would be “no verdict”; for in such a mixed population as Arvallon had, with its diversified foreign elements, how could he hope to get twelve men to think alike on such a vexed question? And an appeal to the brute force of the law to support his faith was against Turnbull's principles, for he had an abiding belief that the Church should not lean on, but support, the State; should not hide behind the law, but lead in the formation of that sound public opinion that is the only rational basis for just laws. He wanted the Church to be so firmly founded in true faith that it would compel obedience to its tenets of and by itself, not because of the club of the law, used to pound lip-service from those terrorized by men in blue-coated uniforms; yearned to win those young men, not to force them.

“We got permission to use de lot; we ain't takin' no skin off'n your nose,” Wilclox insisted, pausing, his bat drawn back to swat the ball that Pitcher Larson of the opposing nine was about to deliver; “so on yer way, now, on yer way. We got th' lease on this lot.”

Turnbull had the good sense to swing away from the fence. He started to walk back toward the town, pursued by ribald laughter and shouts of “Yah! Yah!!”

He brought the subject up at the meeting of the First Church Men's Class that evening, after the regular service, when the men remained for a conference over several routine parish matters.

“I wish, men,” he said, “there was some way of getting those splendid young fellows into this class. What can we do for them?”

“I wish you'd tell me,” said Andrew Pratt, a foreman in No. 8 Mill; “Wilclox is one of the best workmen in my shift except on Mondays, when he is apt to be unnerved from the beer-drinking session that follows the Sunday game of baseball. They buy a half-barrel and the losing nine pays for it.”

“I didn't know it was as bad as that,” Turnbull said, deeper regret still in his voice. “What sort of a fellow is that Wilclox, outside of his ball-playing and beer-drinking?”

“A decent chap. He supports his widowed mother and his sister; never has a bill collector running to the office to try to garnishee his wages; has good standing in his ward political club and in several lodges—in fact, a merry, likable lad, apart from what you have mentioned.”

“I wish we had him—and all of them,” Turnbull insisted. “How could we get a hold on him and them? Think of it, men; dozens of hardy, muscular young lads like that, just going to waste, spoiling before our eyes for lack of proper use. Can't some of you suggest something? I've exhausted all my resources of moral suasion.”

There was a moment of silence as the minister settled his tall frame deeper into his chair and began to think. His broad shoulders he let sag a bit as he relaxed. His long, strong arms he stretched out and his deft, eager fingers drummed a merry rhythm on the conference table that centered the class room. His vivid blue eyes scanned the faces of the men about the table—Andrew Pratt, a bit chunky, but active, brown of hair and eye; Porter Browne, slight, wistfully apt in service, impulsive, red of hair, gray of eye; Brill Scott, swart of hair and skin, with rumply hair that he kept curried up well with nervous, spatulate digits, and with snapping black eyes; Anson McCorkle, tall, lanky, inclined to be noisy; Ames Blossom, a bit fat, but active and fair, cool, heady; and Alex Garson, youngest of them all, compactly built, with dancing, merry eyes, a smile always ready—a smile that was not a smirk—lightning-like in action, growing in power as he settled into the stride of everyday life after taking high honors, in his studies and athletics, in Harvard. Those mentioned were only examples, picked at random from that class of workers.

“I think I've an idea,” Alex snapped out, spri to his feet. “I played with Pug when we were I often ran away from the boys of my set just off fishing or berrying with the scamp. He was fun to be with.”

“What is it, Garson?” Turnbull asked eag “your ideas often are very useful, always sugge of some good, even when we have to modify the practice.”

“It is just this,” as the others leaned forwar catch the words. “Pug Wilclox is crazy over base He had rather play than eat. He is a fine pitcher has an ambition to get into organized baseball. S day he'll do it, too, for the mill lads tell me already several of the minor league teams, who w all developing amateurs, have had scouts ove watch those Sunday games in the big lot up be the No. 8 Mill.”

“Well?”

“Wilclox thinks in terms of baseball, meas everything, outside of his work, in terms of b ball.”

“Go on,” Turnbull said excitedly; “I am begin to see what you are aiming at.”

“More'n I can see,” said McCorkle.

“Me either,” from Scott.

“You just hold your horses, children,” and flashed at them his merry smile that was not a sm but a warmth-giving offering of his inner self.

“Yes, let Garson tell it his own way,” Pratt gested.

“Suppose,” Garson went on, “we meet Wil where he lives; that is, challenge his team to a ga of baseball on the company diamond and make prize for which we play Sunday baseball!”

“I don't quite see it yet,” Turnbull said. puzzled.

“Why, get Wilclox mad and irritate him and to him that our Men's Class nine can beat his nine hollow, and if he loses he and his friends are to give their Sunday games for a certain period. If they w we are to make no protest, but shall reserve the to work on them some other way. . . .”

“This seems rather like gambling with the Lo business,” Pratt objected.

“No; there'll be no gamble about it.”

“But you know those fellows are mighty g players,” Scott chimed in with. “And in the hard kind of practice, too. We never could beat the Why, with our week-end six-inning games, just to up an appetite for our Saturday class dinner, w make a fine show challenging Pug's team. professional interstate team. I think we'd have no chance at all."

"If Garson could pitch again!" Blossom regretted; "but, Alex, you've given your word to your father to drop all athletics and settle down to your proper place as junior in your father's law firm."

"Let that part rest for a while," Garson said rapidly; "and let's see what else we've got to build on. Mr. Turnbull, you've been out of college now ten years, but have kept in good trim with your long walks and are in fair practice as catcher of our team."

"Yes," Turnbull said; "a man who has been a catcher does not grow stale, like a pitcher or other player, if he takes care of himself. I think I could catch well—almost as well as ever—"

"And you were the star of Wesleyanne in your senior year."

Turnbull modestly waved aside this tribute.

"There's McCorkle, if he'd get down to it, would hold down first base in grand style, but he will not practice any more."

"I will buckle in, if you say so," McCorkle offered.

"Good! Now with Pratt at short, Scott at second, Porter Browne at third and with Johnson, Anderson and Martin in the field, we ought to make a showing anyway."

"But not against that nine of roughnecks," Turnbull objected.

"Oh, I don't know. Our class team are all good hitters. Of course Pug is a fine pitcher, but I've studied him out, and I think, with some coaching, I can manage to put two or three of our best hitters in possession of knowledge that will enable them to make some good hits off him. He has only two or three good curves now, but his wonderful speed is what counts, and his control of the ball. Put him in a big league team and let him be coached by Mathewson or some of the veterans and he would be a wonder. He has a lot to learn yet. I figure if we played him we would need only half a dozen hits to win. . . ."

"But where are we to get a pitcher who can hold the Wilclox Tigers down to a few scattered hits as we should have to do to beat them with half a dozen to our credit?" from Scott.

"You leave that to Mr. Turnbull . . ."

"Whaa-a-a-at!" and the parson evinced his surprise in a long-drawn-out exclamation of surprise and unbelief.

"Yes, to Mr. Turnbull. If he will go to my dad and tell him just what the situation is and make the right plea, he will, I am sure, release me from my promise never to handle a baseball again in competition."

"Who-o-o-o-ope-e-e-eee!" from them all. They got up, swarmed about the young man who had been the star no-hit pitcher of the big college league, thumped him on the back and shook his hand. The class-room seldom had resounded to such glad cries of manly joy.

"And I'll not only pitch my head off to whip Pug Wilclox, but will coach the team as well."

"Good!! Splendid! I'll make your dad give in, if I have to throw him and hold him down till he promises," Turnbull stormed.

"And we better begin to brag of what we're going to do," Alex said.

"Why not keep it quiet until we get into condition?" Scott objected.

"No; let's brag and draw them on. They will sneer at us and jump at the chance to down us, as they will believe they easily can do," Alex said eagerly; "let's lay a regular trap for them. Have the game take place on the company's diamonds, where the professional games are played—everything right out in public, with all the conditions understood."

"But if we fail?" Turnbull said faintly, whom a doubt had assailed.

"In the bright lexicon of our baseballistic plans, there's no such word as fail," Alex chortled.

"All right, then," and they felt swept away with his enthusiasm, "we'll go in—"

"And win!" from them all.

"I only reserve one privilege to myself," Garson cut in with.

"And that," from several.

"Is to deliver the challenge myself, in my own way, asking you all meantime to keep your own counsel on this matter. "Let me manage it, my own way, in all things even if I seem to act rather queerly. As I understand it, the thing we want is to win Pug and his friends, whether we win the game or not, but we must win the game if that's what's needed."

"Agreed," cried out Turnbull and the others; "we put ourselves under your orders, Captain Garson, for the purposes of this soul-series baseball match."

"And I accept the leadership," Alex said, as they congratulated him anew upon his idea and acceptance of leadership.

Wilclox's Tigers were holding Mill No. 5's Giants, 5-4. It was the last of the ninth inning. The Giants had two men on bases and their best batsman, O'Brien, was at the plate, with two strikes on him, three balls in favor of him. Wilclox came in from the pitcher's box for a very brief whispered conference with Catcher Morano, the squat, sure-fire little catcher of the Tigers, who drew aside his mask so Pug could insert his puckered lips into the Italian's right ear for the very faint, sibilant hint of what he thought ought to be done at that great crisis in baseballdom. The game was being played in the old pasture on a Saturday half-holiday, next after Garson had broached his famous plan to the Men's Class. There was a buzz of admiration from Pug's friends, who were many, even among the ranks of the supporters of the opposing team.

From the fence, on whose topmost rail Garson sat, he called:

"Swat it, O'Brien; he's not got anything on his ball you can't hit."

There was a flurry at this unseemly interruption. Pug glanced up scornfully to note who it was that dared twit him thus openly. He grinned at Alex, whom he had known since boyhood. The reputation the young lawyer had made in college sports had been an inspiration to Pug in his ambition to shine as a diamond star.

"Make a homer," Alex taunted. "You can do it. Those Tigers are pretty soft, if you'd only take a real whack at them and not let Pug scare you with his puffed-up reputation."

O'Brien turned and wig-wagged appreciation for the verbal aid Garson was giving him in irritating Pug at the crisis of the game.

Along the fence appeared half a dozen other of the members of the First Church Men's Class, Turnbull with them. They lined up to watch the climax.

"I call it rotten work when the Tigers let Mill 5 get two men on bases like that," Garson ground in against Pug's now ruffled grain.

"Play ball!" from the crowd.

Pug walked quickly to the pitcher's mound and began to "wind up" for the crucial throw. O'Brien patted the base with his bat-tip and squatted slightly, ready for the hoped-for impact of ash against leather ball.

"Yah! Yah!!" from the Men's Class rooters for the Mill 5; "hit it, O'Brien; we got him going."

Wilclox unloosed the fury of his good right arm. The ball, with a bullet's speed and accuracy, sped toward the plate, plainly meant for one of Wilclox's famous straightaways that got over the plate so soon the batter could not find it.

The crowd's breathing ceased. O'Brien leaned against his bat. No "thwack" resulted. There was a dull thud as the ball sank into the catcher's big mit.

"Batter's out!" the umpire called.

"Yah! Yah!! Yah!!!" from Pug's nine and friends. They swarmed about him, carried him on their shoulders. He, aloft, grinned more happily than ever across the sea of tousled heads at Garson and his friends.

When he was set down and h gaged himself from the admirin he came across to see Garson, as he came:

"I wanted to win that gan Alex."

"You want to win them all.

"But this one the worst of a Carney, scout of the Interstate was back in the crowd. He watching me now for some tim can make good in my amate this year I've a promise of a with them next spring."

"I'm glad to hear that; b don't you play with a real tean practiced up?"

"Real team! My Tigers ha everythin' in sight here. . . ."

"Yes, but not our Men's team. . . ."

"Say, Garson, and beggin' th nee's pardon," and Pug spat fully; "I watched you mutts week ago las' Wednesday. You me laugh. Now, if you could a like Mr. Turnbull can catch, might be somethin' to you."

Several of Pug's team mates had gathered around to listen their hero nagged at the young stocking" leader.

"Something to us!" Turnbull on; "I am sure the Men's Clas could beat your poor Tigers."

"Aw, c'm off, will you?" scor "don't make me laugh; my cracked."

This sally brought out a great from the swelling crowd of list By now most of the players and tors, sensing something was afoot near at hand, ringing Pug and his players in.

"Got him where I want him no got to accept our challenge o down before all his friends," G flashed into Turnbull's ear, in a pered aside.

"Oh, I don't know," Scott sn "we've got some team, too."

"I never could see that the were much of a team," Brill snapp

The tone in which Alex expressed irritant phrase was masterly in trionic worth.

"Well, then?"

"What's the prize?"

"Oh, you're afraid to risk m Want to be cautious about that, t

"Looka here, Alex, you know be that. What's the prize? You might want to play for more'n we w ing fellows can match."

"We don't want to play money. . . ."

"What then?"

"You fellows hold a lease on this you put up that lease for the next years that it runs, against a turkey ner for the two teams, we to pay fo dinner if we lose?"

"What's th' idear?"

"Oh, that's all, just what I said."

"Aw, there's somethin' else."

"Betcha there is," from several Pug's friends.

"Well, there is," Turnbull cut with, at a private signal from Gars "we want to get that lot for our u Sunday afternoons. We are going hold some open air services there w the weather is good, and perhaps the evening service forward all dur ong days, and hold it here in the ."

Vhy, the Men's Class will wallop off the mound," Garson dripped onto Pug's lacerated pride.

'a can't," he snapped; "ya can't."

"Ya're hitting me where I live, now, dominee," he said, with a genial smile.

The Men's Class conspirators trooped off. When they were at a safe distance, Garson said:

"I congratulate you all on the way you carried it off. Catching him in the middle of his crowd and 'sassing' him like that capped the climax."

"Yes, and even if we lose, we win," Turnbull laughed.

"How's that?" from several.

"Why, if we go down fighting like good sportsmen, they will respect us, and we may get at them finally. And if we win . . ."

"It will take some management then," Scott said sagely. "If it were not that the pasture lot is the only good diamond within striking distance of town, to win it would not be so important. But with it won, we may be able to take other steps toward reclaiming those magnificently wrong Tigers."

"Yes," Turnbull said, a soul-greedy look in his eyes; "they are just so much unharnessed Christian horsepower now, going to waste. I want to gear them up to Christ."

"We can do it," Garson said enthusiastically. "Win or lose, we'll do it."

Cart for Sister's Doll

I only had a little cart for my dolls to ride in!" Jim heard his nger sister say, one rainy afternoon. If you can find me four empty ɔls, for wheels, I can make you one," old her.

he spools were found, and Jim went to his carpenter's shelf in the wood- l and made a cart in this way:

Addition to Sewing-Room

ROBERT had often noticed that his mother was constantly mixing up her tissue-paper sewing-patterns, and one day he thought out a way to help her to keep track of them more easily. This is what he did:

He took an egg crate and, taking out its cardboard divisions, he painted the box white. The cardboard divisions he dipped into a pot of whitewash and, when dry, put them back into the crate.

He then took the box up into his mother's sewing-room and put it on its side on a low shelf. That evening his mother and he had great fun doubling each one of her paper patterns lengthwise, slipping a rubber band over it to keep it folded, and putting it in its particular compartment in the egg crate.

THE NEW SERIES HAYNES ITS FACTORS OF CHARACTER

BEAUTY, strength, power and comfort—these are the essential factors of character in a car.

Real character cannot exist if one factor must be sacrificed to secure another. Haynes engineers and designers have held this principle through all the 26 years of Haynes history—and the new series Haynes exemplifies the worthiness of their skill.

This spirit imbues the entire Haynes organization. The character of the Haynes must not only be built into it at the factory; it is furthermore expressed in the service rendered by Haynes representatives.

The new series Haynes four-door roadster, with its full aluminum body, its roomy seating arrangement, its hand-buffed leather upholstery, its pleasant lines, its powerful, dependable motor—signally shows the character-value of these four factors which distinguish the Haynes—beauty, strength, power and comfort.

In every way consistent with maintaining the character of the Haynes we are expediting deliveries, but we advise promptness in selecting the new Haynes you wish to own.

Or will a smaller $750 tractor do all your work?

A tractor can save money on every farm—if it is properly selected—or, it can prove a total loss if not intelligently handled and not adapted to the work at hand.

It is the business of the Motor Service Bureau, recently organized by The Christian Herald, to help its readers choose the tractor best suited to their needs.

Salvation in Extremity

SUNDAY. Ps. 22:21. "Yea, from the horns of the wild oxen thou hast answered me." Here is a man proclaiming that he has found deliverance from the very jaws of death. He has been saved in the extreme limit of peril when salvation seemed humanly impossible. The wild oxen were out. They had overtaken him and he was just about to be impaled. The breath of death was upon him. And when no earthly ministry could intervene between him and destruction he was rescued by the merciful providence of the Lord. "Yea, from the horns of the wild oxen thou hast answered me."

Is this salvation, even in the very leap of death, a vital part of the evangel of our day? How far do we go in our proclamation of the saving grace of God? Are we telling everybody that God can deliver from the horns of the wild oxen? Or is there something lame in our assurance, and does our evangel consequently stammer in hesitancy and reserve? Unless we can speak of salvation in uttermost extremity with a confident tone that will arrest and startle the world, we have really nothing worth saying at all. What can be done for men and women when the wild oxen are upon them? This is the crux and test of our religion. When a herd of wild passions are goring some poor soul to death, has our Gospel any invincible means of deliverance? When a life is all broken to pieces, and is registered in the lists of human judgment as absolutely hopeless, do we know a secret that can stagger and beat the wild oxen, not only setting the victim free, but restoring him to health and wholeness again? Are there any circumstances where the wild oxen are most assuredly the lords of the field?

It has been the glory of all great preaching that its evangel has covered the most awful perils in human necessity. It has proclaimed its good news to men and women who were in the murderous grip of apparently certain destruction. It has sung of dawn at the midnight. It has sung its songs at the very mouth of hell. I delight to turn over the pages of John Wesley's Journal and note with what untrembling confidence he brings his Gospel to the field where the wild oxen are goring their victims to death. "This morning I went and offered free salvation to four condemned felons in Newgate Jail!" There are hundreds of entries just like that. They are the words of a herald who had invincible faith in the power of redeeming grace. Let the wild oxen be foaming and tearing up the ground in their rage; here is the assured secret of salvation!

Dying Daily

MONDAY. I Cor. 15:31. "I die daily." Everything we do takes toll of blood and tissue, brain and brawn. Every stroke of the pen, blow of the hammer and thought of the brain demands a part of us. When a man writes a book so much of him dies. But that which dies lives again in literature. Therefore, if a man die daily in his labor, that labor should be worth while. He should lose himself in the things that help and not hinder, so that he might live again in the things that will help and not hinder. Let him write a good book. Our work, thought, speech, goings and comings are the conservation of energy. It is the directing of one kind of power through certain channels in order to live as another kind of power. The seed dropped into the ground dies to seed life in order to life in harvest life. It dies to corn-life so that it might live in bread-life. All life is sacrificial. Then let us choose our altars of sacrifice. The tragedy of the ages is not that humanity has not

Clouds Without Water

RIDAY. Jude 12. "Clouds without water." In the East clouds out water are great disappoints to the people, where they ded so much on the rain. The figure striking one because the clouds do give out that which the people have ght to expect.

. Love that has lost its emotion is a d without water. Such love is cold, d and useless. It is like the cold embers on the hearth where once there burned a fire warm and bright.

When Jesus talked to the disciples on the way to Emmaus their hearts "burned within them." We should all be disciples with burning hearts; for when the heart has ceased to burn with the emotion of love for Christ it has ceased to beat in harmony with God.

2. Faith that has lost its power is a cloud without water. Faith ought to have all power. A great deal of it has no power. We ought to have power enough in our faith to remove mountains and to move God. Our faith should be so great that it can overcome the world; the world of sin, sorrow and death. Paul was able to say at the end of life that he had kept the faith and it now kept him in death.

3. Work that has lost its enthusiasm is a cloud without water. The spirit has gone out of it, and when the spirit of enthusiasm goes out of our work it leaves nothing but the corpse of failure. The spirit is the thing that counts in the home, the church, the nation and life.

The spirit of service must possess us if we are going to follow the Christ who went about doing good. Without enthusiasm but little will ever be accomplished.

4. Prayer that has lost its passion is a cloud without water. There are a few things which are indispensable to the Christian life, and prayer is one of them. But prayer must be more than a habit; it must be the source of communion with God and an opportunity to intercede for others. The prayer of faith will not only save the sick, as we are told, but it will do almost everything else. Prayer can do anything that God can do.

W. W. B.

A Cloud of Witnesses

SATURDAY. John 8 : 51. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, if a man keep my saying, he shall never see death." At the time when these words were spoken they seemed a bold assertion, but even at that time facts were at hand to substantiate them, and more were to follow. There is abundant evidence in sacred history to establish the power of Christ's word over death in all its forms. His word raised the young man of Nain from the bier, the daughter of Jairus from her death-bed, and Lazarus from the grave in which he had lain four days. He drew still more out of the spiritual death of sin: he made fishermen, publicans, adulterers, robbers, murderers, self-righteous doctors of the law, rich and proud lords of the commonwealth who cared not for God, new men. To him Peter confessed: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God." Happy Zaccheus leaped from the sycamore tree to receive him into his house, and heard on his threshold the gladdening greeting of the Lord: "This day is salvation come to this house; for the Son of man is come to seek and save that which is lost." With her penitent tears Mary, touched by his mighty word, bathed his feet and dried them with her hair and anointed them with precious ointment. To him the thief looked from the cross with breaking eye, and pleaded: "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." Nicodemus acknowledged to him what as yet he was too weak to confess openly: "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do the miracles that thou doest, except God be with him. To him Nathanael, an Israelite indeed in whom there was no guile, confessed: "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel." Even at the foot of his cross the heathen centurion exclaimed: "Certainly this was a righteous man; truly this was the Son of God."

Repentance

International Sunday School Lesson for May 25
Jonah 3:1-8, Luke 13:1-5, Acts 2:37, 38 and Rom. 2:4

Turning from Sin to God

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

OUR last few lessons have set before our minds the truths about God and man, sin and the Saviour. Now we have a lesson which challenges us to turn from sin to God and to understand what it is to really and truly repent. For repentance is no light and easy matter. It calls for light and conviction, for decision and action in the spiritual realm. Literally, to repent is to change our thoughts, to "think again" about our life and conduct and relations to God and our neighbors. What the wrongdoer needs is to get a new heart, to "change his mind," getting a new perspective and a new set of working principles. We use the word repent too carelessly, signifying to be sorry merely, whereas it means to be sorry enough to do differently, to stop and turn around and march in the opposite direction.

Hence the need of teachers and prophets to challenge and arouse us to a realization of the nature and consequences of our wrongdoing. Hence the need of standards and of religious education, and above all of exalting Christ before the people, for it is in the vision of Jesus that repentance for sin is most certain to be born.

A Story of Community-wide Repentance

In the book of Jonah there is a brief but moving narrative of a great wicked heathen city stirred to penitence and contrition. What a revelation it is of the unsatisfied longing of the human heart for oneness with the Unseen Holiness, that longing which has filled the heathen world with shrines and pilgrimages and rites without number! In their naïve zeal these Ninevites cover the very beasts of burden with sackcloth! Jonah hadn't expected such a response. He was rebuked by Jehovah for his lack of sympathy and compassion. For God is always yearning over the multitude, his mighty heart of love stirs within him as he witnesses the sin and folly, the aspiration and struggle of his needy ones. Remember how Jesus stood on the Mount of Olives and gazed over Jerusalem, and longed to gather and comfort and shield its sinful and weary people. Jesus would weep over the cities of today as then. Jesus would also wonder that his prophets and preachers were still like Jonah and like the apostles in Samaria—unable to realize that the fields are white unto harvest. For people are readier to respond than we think. That is the lesson of the story of Nineveh's repentance.

Two special thoughts may be gathered from the Bible accounts of aroused communities. The first is that practical, direct challenges are needed, as when Micah pleaded for commercial honesty and fair-dealing, for justice between man and man, and compassion for the poor (see Micah 6:9–12, etc.) The second is that there is such a multiplicity of discordant voices in our religious life today that no challenge sounds clearly enough and compelling enough to the masses of the population. The movement toward Christian Unity should clarify and simplify the appeal of the Church, that it may be a true evangel, a clarion call to penitence and practical religion in the city.

The Universal Need of Repentance

From king to cattle-driver Nineveh felt a consciousness of guilt. It is the universal basis for spiritual life, this sense of something morally wrong or incomplete within us that forces us to look up and out for some "medicine for the soul." In our second selection for reading, some rumor-mongers come to Jesus with the story about those Galileans who had been cruelly shot down by Pilate as they came with sacrifices to the temple. They wish to know if these men were extraordinary sinners that such a fate befell them, and go on to tell of eighteen men who had been crushed in the fall of a tower at Siloam. Jesus turned on his questioners with the statement that all have sinned and that without repentance all shall likewise perish. His invitation echoed that of the prophets and John the Baptist, "Repent ye!" He did not like the impenitent Pharisees, those "elder brothers" who felt that they were spiritually better than all other men. Rather he held up the Prodigal as an example in his humble confession, "Father, I have sinned, I am not worthy to be called thy son!"

Truly, then, all need first of all a definite forsaking of sin, a turning to God in repentance and trust, "with full purpose of, and endeavor after, new obedience"; and secondly, we all need what the choicest saints of God have shown, a permanent element of repentance in our Christian experience which will urge us to higher ideals of life and sacrifice.

We see in Peter's sermon in the Book of Acts a very definite challenge to that great act of repentance which marks conversion to the Christian way. Peter brought home to that crowd their sins and their guilt and elicited a striking response: "What shall we do?" When a man wants to do something about it, his penitence is genuine. Such was that of Zaccheus when he promised the fourfold restitution of his plunder and the gift of half his remaining possessions to the needy. Something ought to signalize a man's conversion and make it forever memorable. That is why Peter at once responded that the truly repentant should acknowledge their new-found faith in public baptism. That is why our rescue mission workers urge the new convert to a public decision and confession of repentance and of faith. It is an absolute fact that a great many men and women have dulled the edge of their conscience by their unwillingness to join the church and to make a good confession of Jesus Christ in the sight of many witnesses. There is deep significance in the text: "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." Salvation is claimed and becomes available in the very registration of belief through public avowal.

Hence if we would leave nothing undone for the salvation of our boys and girls in the classes of our schools, we must not fail to bring them to decision for Christ. Those who unite with the church in a memorable expression of faith will be most apt to follow in the footsteps of the Master in future years.

God's Goodness and the Kingdom's Call

In former times fear was believed to be the chief agency in bringing men to repentance. There is still room for a due emphasis upon the absolute fact that the wages of sin is death, and that whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. Jesus abounded in warnings such as those in today's reading. But he brought in a positive side, which is emphasized in the verse of Romans (2:4) which closes our Scripture lesson. Paul believed that the love of Christ constrains men. He warned those who failed to respond to the love and goodness of God of the certainty of retribution, but he preferred to make the appeal to gratitude and appreciation. So did Jesus. He gave a supreme reason for repentance, as the opportunity of a share in the bringing in of the Kingdom. He wanted men to repent for something, as well as of their sins: "Repent, for the Kingdom of God is at hand." This was not a warning only, but the offering of a privilege. The call of Christ and the challenge of the Kingdom are the highest appeals for forsaking sin the world has ever known. Repent, not for your own sake only, but for Christ's sake and for the sake of your loved ones and for the sake of his kingdom of love and righteousness in all the world. Repent, not simply for what you will escape thereby, but for what you will gain and give. We are saved to serve.

Saved by the Testament

By GEORGE T. B. DAVIS

:E often hears of soldiers' lives being saved by pocket Testaments. It is astonishing how ıtly this has occurred during the t war. Recently, inside of three I saw and handled three Testa- that hắd probably saved their ı' lives over in France.

as a Testament received mp Gordon, and hav- it the pledge of the ; Testament League, ›y one agrees to he book with him ıake it a rule to ›ne or more chap- ıily. The soldier ›ined the League, ıd carried the lit- ok in his pocket een months, and : through three The bullet struck estament and went vay through it, then d off, and went in and his chest, leaving two big ıan from Louisiana showed me his nent, in which a big hole had been y an explosive bullet. This was ›ry: "I was brought up in ıptist Church and joined 1912. I received the ment at Camp Pike. ; in France nearly months and over p eleven times All ne I was in France er touched a drop uor. I read the ment through at ix times. On Oc- 4 we were at Ar- Forest on the ıun front At 12 k came the order to er the top. We ad- d three kilometers, and :30 an explosive bullet : my Testament and tore ıy right through it. It gave big jolt, but did not injure me at About ten minutes later I was ded in the arm by another explo- ›ullet. I went back to the field ıng-station, then to four hospitals, ight from a hospital to the ship. yet I have very little use of my and."

few days ago I received a letter this man, enclosing a picture show- is riddled Testament and his torn t. He wrote that he is assistant intendent of the Sunday school is taking great interest in it. He "You remember I told you I was to be a worker for the Lord, and I am making my start. I hope some day we shall meet and have rt-to-heart talk."

ll another young man showed me ullet-pierced Testament which he taking home to show to his wife. gave him the book the day he left o join the army. He was a Cali- an. This was his story: "My wife ın earnest Christian and at length ıe to make a start in the Christian I went forward and confessed ıt at a revival meeting held by Dr. . Scoville at Fresno, California, and d the church soon afterward. A nonths later I enlisted. The day I 'or the camp, my wife gave me a et Testament and urged me to read ery day. I read it most every day ver a year. At length, in France, achine-gun bullet went straight ıgh the book and into my right The bullet penetrated so deeply they have not beeen able to take t, but the surgeon who operated on said the Testament had doubtless ›ed the force of the bullet suffi- ly to save my life." The soldier d open his shirt, and there was a t scar, like a maltese cross, where bullet had penetrated, and where had operated in seeking to ex- ; it.

ıe war has revealed anew the power ıe Word of God, without the aid of an agencies, to save souls. A man told me of a friend who went to a training-camp and became a sergeant: "His language was so fearful that he was known as 'the foulest-mouthed man in the army.' His wife was a Christian, and gave him a Testament when he left home, but he never used it. We went over to France. One evening we were sitting in our dugout at the front, talking about home and Christianity, and about Testaments saving men's lives. As we talked on, he suggested, to my surprise, that we read a chapter in the Bible each night. I gladly agreed, and we began at Matthew, first chapter. After reading a few evenings he said to me: 'I'm going to be a Christian, and when I get back home I'm going to join the church.' He changed his ways at once, and became an entirely different man. He would go off at times and have prayer by himself. I won't forget a thing that occurred one night when we were being bombarded, and shells of all kinds were dropping around our dugout. It was growing dark and we had no lights of any kind. In order not to miss reading his chapter, my friend sat outside the dugout, and read his portion exposed to shell fire! He is still in France, and I can imagine how happy his wife will be when he returns home a Christian man."

Another man told me how a single verse in the Bible led to his conversion. He said: "One evening on the river Somme, two of us were sleeping in a little dugout. My friend was reading his Testament and came to a word he could not pronounce. I helped him out, and later read several chapters myself. At length I came to Matt. 21 : 22: 'And all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive.' It made a very deep impression on my mind. I started at once to prove it and found it true; and I have found it true ever since. A little later I accepted Christ, and have been trying to live for Him. I am going home to join the church."

Recently I came across a corporal to whom I gave a Testament at Camp MacArthur, Texas, in November, 1917. Speaking of his own experience, the corporal said: "I was in France eight months. I was a scout and observer and sniper, and we were constantly going over the top in our work. I went out every night for a week to cut wires and other duties, and would crawl right up to the German trenches. They would open machine-gun fire and send up flares, but they never discovered us. At length I was wounded twice in the leg. I was in six hospitals, and each time they took away all my clothes, but I managed to save the Testament by wrapping it in a handkerchief or piece of bandage cloth, and kept it in my pajamas pocket when in the hospital. During the entire time I was in the army I never swore once, in spite of the profane language used by most of the others. Money could not buy that little Testament which I carried throughout my stay on the other side."

The fiercest battles fought in France were not those of shot and shell, but the battle of man's soul to lead a clean, noble Christian life amid the moral pitfalls of the army and the still greater temptations that faced the men at every turn when off duty.

Week by week, at a big debarkation camp, I greet multitudes of the returning heroes just before they leave for their home camp. Will not the Christian Herald readers pray for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon these men?

Strengthening the Rural Community

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Matt. 9:35-38

THE last thirty years have changed farming from a rule-of-thumb trade to a scientific profession. It has changed rural communities also. The farmer of the last generation was an individualist, isolated, organized perhaps, but for political rather than productive effort. Today, cooperative creameries, mutual elevators, telephones, rural free delivery, improved roads, machinery and the automobile make the countryside as unified as the city, but with a more abounding life and a wider opportunity for personal growth and Christian service. A not inconsequent part of the remade country is the graded school, which has replaced the little red schoolhouse, and which graduates its pupils direct to the city high schools or the academies. But the Little Brown Church has too often remained unchanged, a center of sacred memories but not of vital outreach, of spiritual influence which is able to permeate the throbbing life of the new country. Some churches are a notable exception. In them the Boy Scouts, the Camp Fire Girls, the canning clubs, the men's forum and the ladies' reading circle center as naturally as the young people's society, the Sunday school and the missionary society. They teach practical living along with faith, they lead in agriculture as well as doctrine, they live the life of the people, keeping always close to the spirit of Christ and the spiritual purposes of God. It is a work which challenges the students in college, and many young theologs are preparing to be ministers to the rural community.

The leader of this meeting or any one interested in a better countryside will do well to secure a copy of "The Church in Rural America," by Garland A. Bricker, published by the Standard Publishing Company, Cincinnati, Ohio. It is sold for one dollar, postpaid. Dr. Bricker is director of the Rural Extension Service of Syracuse University, and his book is an open door to a better country. The whole problem of the rural community and the relation of the church to it is presented logically, convincingly and hopefully. It is a working manual for a strengthened, because spiritually awakened, community.

How Do Men Confess Christ, and How Deny Him?

Epworth League Topic. Rom. 10:9; Luke 22:55-61

WE CONFESS Christ with the mouth, and thus also, as did Peter, we may deny him. We confess with praise. We will probably deny with an oath, for the taking of his name in vain is the surest means to a complete denial. But we may confess Christ also in other ways than by word of mouth. We confess Christ when we receive baptism before entering the fellowship of the church. We confess him as we join the church, for the ritual requires that we declare our faith before the church. We confess him also as we live out his spirit in our daily lives, yet, no matter how we may confess him vocally, we may be patently denying him in every act and thought. Unkindness, uncleanness of speech and life, uncharitableness, untruth, self-seeking, all these deny Christ. Kindness, cleanness, charitableness, truth, unselfishness, these mightily support our oral testimony.

God's Promises

Christian Endeavor Topic. I Kings 8:54-61; II Peter 1:1-4

GOD'S promises never fail. Sometimes we do. The promises are not to mankind promiscuously, but to those who obey God and seek him. The fulfilment of every promise is predicated upon our own obedience. Sometimes we forget this key that unlocks every treasure-house of mercy and heavenly strength. We go to our knees to plead the promises, unforgiving; we pray for things for our own aggrandizement; we harbor in some corner of our heart sin or envy or lust for power; we think more highly of ourselves than we ought to think, and we pray, but the answer waits upon the conditions we have left unfulfilled. We will find God with us when we incline our hearts unto him, to walk in all his ways. We will know our prayers are answered when we pray, "Not my will but thine." We will make certain of the promises when our feet walk in paths of obedience and love unfeigned, when we have become, through faith, partakers of the divine nature. Then his power will strengthen us, his vision will enlighten us, his Spirit will inspire us, and we will prosper in all that is good.

Linking Up the Man With the Work

SOME clear-headed and practical-minded men in the Brotherhood of St. Andrew have launched a program for linking up the church with the religious, social and economic needs of our returning soldiers and sailors which deserves attention. The scheme, which is now being submitted to 150,000 church congregations in the United States, takes in four phases each of which is of vital importance: the man's home, his family, the job and his church. Thousands of committees have already been organized and the United States Employment Service and other active bodies are cooperating.

Naturally, the first step is to find employment for the men who have come back to us from the war. The combined influence of the congregation and community is exerted to see that the men get suitable occupation at which they can make good. First, each congregation absorbs all it can of the quota through its own men of business. Communication is established with the man's family, placing the committee's services at his disposal. The material, mental and spiritual needs of the home are studied with a view to helpfulness. Every man who has returned is taken in hand and all avenues promising employment are searched until a place is found for him. His social prospects are made attractive by putting him in touch with men who can be helpful to him in many ways. He is made to feel that a real welcome consists in more than cheers and crowds and a parade—in something that means rehabilitation and comfort and promises of friendships that will help him along in a practical way which he can understand. Of course, the spiritual side is not neglected.

A Bible Revival

THE combination of Torrey-Alexander was reunited in a series of evangelistic meetings in the city of Los Angeles. The services were conducted under the auspices and in connection with the Bible Institute of that city. The spacious auditorium, with 4,200 seats, proved to be none too large, even though there was no uniting of the churches of the city. The crowds were largely composed of tourists. A remarkable feature of the campaign was the working of a program of personal work, or what they called a Bible revival, throughout the city. A centrally located theater was engaged for noon meetings, and for six weeks there went out of that place a corps of personal workers, their accouterment being a Testament and a song book. The accumulation of interest and results was remarkable. Among those sought out by the personal workers were the Mayor, the Chief of the Fire Department, the Chief of the Police Department. The work spread throughout the whole city, and rich and poor alike are carrying the Pocket Testament and reading it daily. More than nine thousand people have signed a pledge to read a chapter a day and strive to win others to Christ. The Bible and Christianity have become everyday conversation. GEORGE W. COOKE.

uestions and Answers

MRS. S., Yonkers, N. Y., writes: "It is my custom to tell a story, either real or fanciful, to my little folks before bedtime. A few evenings told them about the Good Road and the Road. I found I had caught their attenand believing that other mothers may o pass the idea along to their own groups ldren I will give you the outlines, and can fill in for themselves. One of my daughters had been reading a book on r-Never Land,' and she asked me it was and how people got there. They ere, I said, by going off the right path, pretty road or lane called the By-and-oad. It is full of nooks and picturesque places, sometimes shooting off in one din and again in another, so that it took up eir time to explore it, and ended in bering them. This By-and-By Road ended road, swampy field, stretching out as far e eye could see, with no safe road leadnywhere. This, said I, is Never-Never , because it doesn't take you to any parr place where you want to go, and nothver happens there according to your s. And how do they get out of Never-r Land, one of the children asked. Of e, said I, most people would spend the looking around for some short cut across e main road, which is the right thoroughbut the only way is to retrace your steps. e are always people going along that By-By Road, some of them traveling back y and painfully over the road they had so gaily along only a little while before. of nice folks among them, too: young peoust like you, who, if they had kept on the thoroughfare and attended to what their s taught them, would probably have ed some place worth while. But there thers who, unfortunately, never find their back. The only safe way is to resist the tation to go off the right road. This little seemed to set the children thinking, and that they had made up their minds that as a good thing to look out for the safe , and to walk therein."

. R., Greensboro, Ga. Read the fourth ter of the Epistle of James, which covers question in your letter. War and strife violence of every kind are the result of sin. hristian counsels prevailed, /there would o war. The commandment against killing o be interpreted in its spirit and the lusion—if we accept the Bible record as lence, as in the cases of Joshua, David, Gidand other Old Testament saints—is inevle that, while war is an evil and the oute of evil conditions, there are times when comes the duty, even of Christian nations, ppose and resist to the utmost the violence hose who take up arms to slay for the sheer of conquest. Thus wars of defense, or righteous cause, are justified by general sent, and they are nowhere condemned in ipture. The ideal condition is that debed in Isa. 2 : 4: but that cannot be realized il sin is overcome and the nations gospelized the whole world accepts the divine soverty.

. W., Montgomery. There are various nts of Christian behavior applicable to dern life for which no specific rule or authorcan be found in the Bible, as social condis have greatly changed. Modern vices l indulgences have sprung up, and these st be dealt with by the Christian as his science and judgment dictate. Dancing, ugh not in itself necessarily sinful, is apt degenerate into sin. Had promiscuous cing, as it exists in society today, been valent in Bible times (instead of the comatively innocent amusement then known, the ceremonial or religious dances), it uld unquestionably have been a subject of unciation as sweeping as that applied to y of the vices of that time. The purpose of Scriptures is to give general principles for the new life, and so leave us the great benefit of deciding for ourselves how to apply them. In modern dancing, the evil so far overbalances the good that it is indefensible and should not be sustained by Christians. The church opposes dancing, especially in its promiscuous form, because it has been a means of moral danger to multitudes, and has led many to ruin through forming evil acquaintanceships. We think the church is absolutely right in this. The dance hall, as everybody knows, is in many of the larger cities a highway to degradation. It is the old question over again whether we cannot save our pleasures. We can, but only by purifying them, and in the case of dancing, as also in that of drinking and cards, the tendency is all to excess and danger. Therefore, the true duty of the Christian is to avoid even the appearance of evil, and let such things alone, if not for his own sake, then for the sake of others who may be influenced by his example.

Emma B., Des Moines, Iowa. Yes, war gardens are being planned extensively for this year, but they will now be Victory gardens.

Mrs. A. G., Chicago. It is proper to pray to God that those who are mistreating you may repent of their sin and wickedness and be kind. It is hardly Christian to ask God to deal harshly with them. David asked God to confound his enemies, but David was God's servant in a particular sense, and those who sought his life were in fact enemies of God. We should forgive those who treat us ill, and then ask God to give them a change of heart and a kindlier spirit.

Violet, Overton, Ky. During the war the land between the opposing trenches was called "No Man's Land." It was so called because neither side controlled it. It was swept by the fire of both sides and was the scene of numberless conflicts between patrols. Uncle Sam could not give homesteads in this "No Man's Land" to his soldiers, for the soil belongs to France and Belgium. But there are deserts in the West which because of aridity deserve this name, and whose fertile soil needs only water to make them garden spots. Uncle Sam proposes to build irrigation works to reclaim these lands and thus make available homesteads for soldiers desiring them.

F. S. B., Greeley, Colo. The verses you refer to are prophetic, picturing the sorrows of Israel, resulting from their falling away from God under Jeroboam. The language is plain, but not "miserable." God had a people to teach, and some of the lessons needed to be radical. Soft words and elegant phrases would not have done. It required strong, rugged, homely, unmistakable words to drive the truth home, and the inspired writers used them under God's guidance.

A. S., New Phila., Ohio. You seem to have misread the announcement. The film "Fit to Win" was shown to men and women on alternate evenings and not to young men and women in the same audience. We have not seen the film but it has the official approval of the government, and we believe deserves the commendation it has received. The church may well welcome every effective aid in the teaching of morals, whether school or lecture or movie. There are some truths which instruct mature minds but which unsettle immature minds, therefore the age limitation.

R. P. McC., Belle Centre, Ohio. We have no official record of any religious service in connection with the Peace Congress. We know, however, that its labors, from the very outset, have been a subject of imploration from the hearts of multitudes in many lands, and in none more than in our own land. Churches of all denominations, great religious bodies in convention, and unnumbered millions in their own homes have prayed that the deliberations of the Congress and all of its official acts might be inspired by the divine will. Prayer circles have ceaselessly petitioned the Lord on the same subject. Probably no deliberative assemblage was ever so fortified by spiritual appeal as this, for whose guidance nations were on their knees from the opening day till the present.

C. S. B. The time our parents spent in the Garden of Eden is not stated, and it is useless to speculate. There are many traditions among the Jewish rabbis and the Arabians concerning Adam, but they are of little value and add nothing essential to the simple story in Genesis.

The Heart and the Home

Fathers, Make Companions of Your Boys

By MARTIN G. BRUMBAUGH
Former Governor of Pennsylvania

ONE of the best men I ever knew gave to this country three splendid sons, loyal, capable and conscientious. I once asked him how he managed to do it. He said: "I have always made my boys my companions." In the intimate comradeship of father and son there arose the occasion to teach the boys what it is to be a really fine American and a Christian gentleman. The father's wise procedure made three eminent citizens of his sons.

The strength of a nation lies in its spiritual forces, not in its material gains, and the great agencies that conserve spiritual ideals are the home, the church and the school. Unfortunately the home, where most of this should be done, really does the least. All parents holding love for children and country will endeavor to perform their most important duty of maintaining and imparting high ideals, for in the coming days as never before we must give intelligent guidance to our children.

My own father, after church, on Sunday afternoons, often accompanied his three boys to the mountains or forests. There in the cool and silence he gave us many suggestions that have ripened into inestimable good in the years that have come and gone since he can no longer walk with us. We do not see him, but we do feel his presence and gratefully follow his fine teachings.

I urge all fathers to have personal and intimate converse with their sons, and this can be done from the time they are tiny fellows. Impress lofty ideals of duty to God and country. Teach the value of the great cardinal virtues of courtesy, reliability and humility, without which life is a mockery.

Ironing Notes

UNBLEACHED muslin should be placed over a wool fabric or over fine silk when ironed, to prevent glossing.

In pressing woolens, lift the pressing cloth and brush up the nap with a stiff brush after the iron has passed over it.

Waists with heavy embroidery should be ironed on the wrong side over a thick pad into which the embroidery may sink.

In case of scorching, garments should be dipped in cold water instantly and placed in the sunshine to beach. If the scorch is deep, however, a bleaching agent such as Javelle water must be applied.

Large pieces, which are apt to dry in part before being completely ironed, should have a damp cloth over the unironed part. L. E. K.

Is Reverence for Old Age an Obsolete Virtue?

By MARION HARLAND

BEFORE discussing the query which stands at the head of this chapter let me tell a story illustrative of the fact that the aforesaid virtue was held in high repute nearly three centuries ago.

John Tillotson, an eminent English prelate, was born of farmerfolk in Yorkshire. His parents, recognizing his unusual mental gifts, managed to secure for him a liberal education, and he entered the Church, becoming first Dean of Canterbury, then Dean of St. Paul's, finally Archbishop of Canterbury. He had visited his parents yearly, and kept in constant touch with them, but neither had ever been to Canterbury until the old father presented himself at the door of the archiepiscopal palace and asked in the broadest of Yorkshire dialects if "John Tillotson were within?" The liveried lackey who opened the door eyed the aged rustic superciliously and answered roughly in the negative. It so chanced that the archbishop, passing through the hall, caught sight of the figure and heard his father's voice.

"Whereupon"—runs the ancient tale—"he thrust the footman aside and, falling upon his knees, kissed his father's hand and with happy tears besought his blessing."

Let this be the setting of the sketches forwarded to us in reply to a letter published some time ago under the heading of "Grandmother and Girl." First we will have extracts from one who takes the affirmative side of our question.

"I am seventy-one years young (or old, as you please) and am sorry to say that in my observation more elderly people are treated by the young with unkindness and disrespect than are treated otherwise. As to the advantages those same college-bred young people have had, I would respectfully ask whose money has equipped them with all the modern improvements? Their parents, and sometimes grandparents, whom they think so out-of-date! Perhaps those parents have been too busy supplying the means to give their sons and daughters a good education to keep themselves up with the advance of the times.

"I have an instance in mind of a worthy father and mother who spent a large sum of money to give their son a first-class education. He was graduated from a noted college with honors, but during his college term was ashamed to have his old-fashioned parents visit him. I have known many just such instances as 'Grandmother' mentions, some worse, and few that enjoyed the love and kindness that make old age endurable.

"I have not written this as my personal experience, for I am blessed with kind sons. Their wives are my 'daughters.' I love them and have their love in return. My grandchildren are respectful and kind. They are a joy and a comfort to me beyond what words can express.

"I have written in behalf of the many sad cases that have come under my observation in rather a long life."—MRS. E. G. M. (Illinois).

With the coming of the new price, not the slightest change has been made in the machine. In every way it is exactly what we formerly priced at $100.

Our Reason for a Lower Price

Men wonder how we have effected such a remarkable reduction in price without changing the Oliver.

Let us explain. During the war we learned many lessons in economical distribution, ways of saving.

We found that it was unnecessary to have great numbers of traveling salesmen and numerous, expensive branch houses throughout the country.

We were able to discontinue many other superfluous sales methods. As explained further in our booklet, "The High Cost of Typewriters — The Reason and the Remedy."

Old-time extravagant methods had to go during the war. And our new plan was so successful that we are continuing it. We hope never to go back to a $100 price, which was the standard for so many years.

Free Trial—Send No Money

Our new plan is simple. It permits you to be your own salesman. You may order a free trial Oliver directly from this advertisement, via coupon.

Note that the coupon brings either an Oliver or further information.

When you receive the Oliver, use it as if it were your own. Give it every test. Compare it.

If you agree that it is the finest typewriter at any price, and wish to keep it, then pay us at the rate of $3 per month.

Thirteen hundred accidents cause injury or death every day

IN a single day in New York City alone it is estimated that there are 33 automobile accidents serious enough to report—accidents which caused injury or death.

For the entire country the number amounts to 1300 every day.

At least 10 per cent of these accidents could have been avoided if the brakes had been in good condition, and properly applied. That is the judgment of New Jersey state authorities.

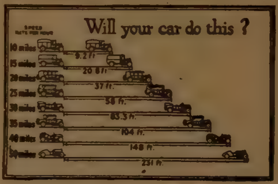
Brake inspection insures safety

It is so simple to be on the safe side. Go to your garage man today, and have your brakes inspected. Thousands of motorists are making this a regular precaution at sixty day intervals. Possibly a simple tightening of the brake rods, or an adjustment of the equalizer, is all that is needed to give you safety instead of ever-present danger.

If the garage man says the brakes need relining, follow his advice without any delay.

Why Thermoid brake lining is safest and wears longest

In each square inch of Thermoid brake lining there is 40% more material than in ordinary woven lining. This additional body gives a closer texture which is made tight and compact by hydraulic compression under 2000 lbs. pressure. In addition to this, Thermoid is Grapnalized, an exclusive process in manufacture which enables it to resist moisture, oil and gasoline.



This chart shows the distances in which a car should stop, at any given speed, if the brakes are efficient.

The close, compact texture of Thermoid, so processed, causes it to wear down more slowly than ordinary brake lining, and evenly so that it maintains its gripping power even when worn to wafer thinness.

The engineers and manufacturers of 50 of the leading passenger cars and trucks have standardized on Thermoid Hydraulic Compressed Brake Lining because it makes their cars safer.

Have your brakes inspected today. Remember that every foot of Thermoid is backed by Our Guarantee: Thermoid will make good—or WE WILL.

Teutons Learn the Measure of Defeat

Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau
Head of German Peace Delegates

Premier Orlando of Italy
The champion of Fiume

Stephen Pichon of France
Chairman of League of Nations

GERMANY did not like the peace terms dictated by the Allies. They were pronounced insulting and vindictive; they were degrading and impossible. So the Ebert Government proclaimed a week of mourning and declared the terms "a peace of violence," while it promised to answer with a proposal of "a peace of right on the basis of a lasting peace of the nations." Ebert also declared that the terms implied the slavery of German labor to Allied capitalism, that the peace proposed was unbearable and contrary to President Wilson's fourteen points.

Correspondents reported the German people as stupefied at the peace terms, while the German press was almost a unit in its violent opposition to acceptance. On the other hand, clear thinkers like Maximilian Harden saw only harsh, inflexible justice in the terms, reminding the nation of its own demands at Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest. The Spartacides urged the Government to sign, because the people wanted peace at any cost.

It was expected that the German Government would issue an appeal to the Socialists in Allied countries to save the German worker from a "capitalistic peace," thus attempting to divide Allied popular sentiment, and that they would present counter proposals modifying the terms to accord more closely in their eyes with the fourteen points, thus hoping to set America against the rest of the Allies; also that the delegates would threaten not to sign, and the plenipotentiaries might even be recalled; but the general opinion in Allied quarters was that the treaty would be signed ultimately, because it must be. The Germans knew quite well what would happen otherwise.

Meanwhile the Germans at Versailles sent a half dozen delegates back home on May 10 with copies of the treaty. Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau on May 10 submitted to Premier Clemenceau a note declaring that the treaty contained demands which could be borne by no people, many of them incapable of accomplishment, and that "the basis of the peace of right agreed upon between the belligerents has been abandoned." He was told in reply that the terms had been prepared with constant thought of the principles on which the armistice was based, and that the Allied representatives could "admit of no discussion of their right to insist on the terms substantially as drafted."

Later, the Germans asked attention to the fact that they were asked to sign the draft of the League of Nations, but that Germany was not mentioned among the nations to be asked to join. They asked if such an invitation was intended. They were advised that on re-examination of the plan, they would find provision for the admission of new members.

IT WAS in the great hall of the Trianon Palace at Versailles, on May 7, the anniversary of the sinking of the Lusitania, that the first meeting of the Peace Congress was convened. The meeting was scheduled to begin at 3 o'clock. When all of the Allied delegates were in their chairs—Premier Clemenceau at the head of the horseshoe table, President Wilson at his right with Premier Lloyd George at his left and the various delegations ranged around the two sides of the horseshoe—Germany's delegates were announced. The Germans were seated at a table in the open end of the horseshoe, facing Premier Clemenceau. There was no pomp or ceremony, no gold lace, only democratic simplicity and an air of serious purpose, which grew tense as the hours passed. Premier Clemenceau declared the session open as soon as the Germans had taken their places. The Premier's speech was short but to the point. He declared that this was not the time nor place for superfluous words; that the Germans had before them the plenipotentiaries of all the Powers united to fight together in the war that had been so cruelly imposed upon them, and that the time had come to settle the account. He said: "You asked for peace. We are ready to give you peace. We shall present to you now a book which contains our conditions. You will have every facility to examine these conditions and the time necessary for it. Everything will be done with the courtesy that is the privilege of civilized nations." He further said: "This second treaty of Versailles has cost us too much not to take on our side all necessary precautions and guarantees that the peace shall be a lasting one." He told them that no oral discussion of the terms would take place, but that the German delegation could submit observations in writing and these would be quickly considered. He gave them a maximum period of fifteen days in which to ask questions or make suggestions.

As Premier Clemenceau finished, the Secretary General of the Peace Conference delivered a copy of the treaty to Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau. The head of the German delegation did not rise to make his reply. This apparent lack of courtesy was explained as possibly due to his recent illness; his secretary stated that while the Count could control his voice, he was not sure of his legs. The incident caused some comment and was looked upon in some quarters as a piece of German arrogance. Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau spoke in German. He said "that the German delegates were under no illusions as to the extent of their defeat or their lack of power." He startled the delegates by declaring: "It is demanded from us that we shall confess ourselves to be the only ones guilty of the war. Such a confession in my mouth would be a lie." He asserted that the German people were not alone guilty; the world war was the crisis of the illness in Europe, which resulted from the policy of Imperialism among the European states, and that Russian mobilization took from the statesmen the possibility of healing, and gave the decision into the hands of the military powers." "Wrong has been done to Belgium" he added, "and we are willing to repair it; but in the manner of making war," he continued, "Germany is not the only guilty one."

Proceeding, he caused considerable stir among the Allied delegates by stating that "crimes in war may not be excusable, but they are committed in the struggle for victory and in the defense of national existence, Passions are aroused which make the consciences of people blunt, but the hundreds of thousands of noncombatants who have perished since November 11, 1918, by reason of the blockade, were killed with cold deliberation after our adversaries had conquered and victory had been assured to them. Think of that when you speak of guilt and punishment!"

The American newspaper representatives reported that at this challenge Premiers Clemenceau and Lloyd George and President Wilson engaged in animated conversation, but apparently decided against any interruption that might change the order of procedure, so no reply was made. The German spokesman was permitted to proceed. He declared that while the Germans stood before their adversaries alone, they were yet not without protection, since President Wilson's declaration had pledged the Allies to renounce a peace of violence and to make a peace of justice. . . . You will find us ready to examine upon this basis the preliminary peace which you have proposed to us," he said, "with a firm intention of rebuilding in cooperation with you that which has been destroyed and repairing any wrong that may have been committed—principally the wrong to Belgium—and to show to mankind new aims of political and social progress."

He declared it would then be the chief task to reestablish the devastated vigor of mankind and to reconstruct the territories of Belgium and of northern France which had been occupied by Germany and which were devastated by the war. In this connection he pleaded that the work should not be done by the German prisoners of war, as prisoners. The League of Nations he pronounced the most sublime thought in the history of mankind, and pleaded for the throwing open of the gates of the League to all who are of good will. Closing, he said "the German people in their hearts are ready to take upon themselves their heavy burdens, if the basis of peace which has been established is not any more shaken." He pledged the German delegates to examine the document handed to them with good will and in the hope that the final result of their interview might be subscribed to by all.

WITH the treaty in the hands of the Germans, the Council of Four at Paris then took up the conclusion of the terms to be presented to Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria. It was reported that Austria would pay an indemnity of $2,500,000,000.

The Italian delegation, headed by Orlando, returned to Paris on Wednesday morning, May 7. It was reported that the question of Fiume had been compromised by assigning it to Italy as mandatory until 1923, when it should become wholly Italian. In the intervening time, the League of Nations will construct a new harbor at some port not far south of Fiume, which will be connected by rail with Agram and with all the important commercial centers. This story was later reported to be premature, and President Wilson was pictured as remaining immovably opposed to the cession of Fiume to Italy.

It was announced on May 11 that French and Belgian troops would form the army of occupation in Germany unless Germany refused to sign the treaty which would force a change of plans. All plans had been completed for an extensive occupation of German territory in the final event of Germany rejecting the treaty. Marshal Foch was announced as having "left for the front" on May 12.

Summary of the Peace Treaty

THE Preamble lists as the Powers concerned in the Treaty the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, referred to as the Five Allied and Associated Powers, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, China, Cuba, Ecuador, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, the Hedjaz, Honduras, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Serbia, Siam, Czechoslovakia and Uruguay.

The Preamble then sets forth the German request for an armistice, the desire of the Allied Powers to end the war begun by the Austrian and German declarations of war and the invasion of Belgium, and provides for the putting in force of the peace, and the resumption of official relations with Germany.

Section I of the Treaty incorporates in the text the League of Nations Covenant, and puts the administration of the Peace terms in the hands of the League.

Section II fixes Germany's boundaries. Alsace-Lorraine is returned to France as before 1870; small districts adjoining Belgium go to her; part of Silesia, most of Posen and West Prussia go to Poland. East Prussia is isolated by the Polish corridor to the free city of Danzig and may be further reduced in size by plebiscites. Danish Schleswig is to have a chance to vote upon its future allegiance. Continental Germany loses 47,787 square miles of her pre-war area of 208,780 square miles.

In Section III, Germany agrees to the abrogation of the Belgian "scrap of paper" treaty of 1839, renounces her treaties of alliance with Luxemburg, and agrees to cede to France all the coal mines in the Saar Basin as compensation for the destruction of French mines, the Basin to be governed for fifteen years under a commission of five, at the end of which time a plebiscite shall determine its allegiance.

Section IV binds Germany to recognize the independence of German Austria, Czechoslavakia and Poland, and to agree to plebiscites in East Prussia where it adjoins Poland and Poles predominate, to recognize the free city of Danzig, and to agree to the proposed plebiscites in Danish Schleswig. The section provides also for the destruction of all fortifications at Heligoland and Dune, and binds Germany to respect the independence of all territory which was a part of the former Russian Empire. Germany must also accept the abrogation of the treaty of Brest-Litovsk and of all treaties entered into with Russia since Brest-Litovsk. Russia's right to restitution and reparation is formally reserved in the Treaty.

Under Section V, Germany must renounce all rights, titles and privileges to all territory outside of Europe, and transfers these rights to the Allied and Associated Powers. German Government property in the colonies passes to the governments which shall execute authority in them. Germany renounces in favor of China all her interests devolving from the settlement of the Boxer trouble and transfers to China all property of hers in China except diplomatic and consular establishments, and all concessions except Kiao-Chau, and renounces all claims against China. Germany similarly renounces all her rights in Siam, Liberia, and Morocco, and recognizes the British protectorate in Egypt. Germany accepts all arrangements which the Allies make with Turkey and Bulgaria, and transfers to Japan all her rights, titles and privileges, and state property in Kiao-Chau, also her cables.

In Section VI, in order to make possible general disarmament, Germany is limited to an army of 100,000 men, including 4,000 officers. The manufacture of armaments and munitions is closely limited. Conscription must be abolished in Germany. Germany must remove within three months all fortified works, fortresses or field works within a zone fifty kilometers east of the Rhine. She may retain her forts on her southern and eastern boundaries. She will be permitted to have six small battleships, none over 10,000 tons, six light cruisers, twelve destroyers, twelve torpedo boats, no submarines, and the personnel is limited to 15,000 men. Germany must surrender forty-two modern destroyers, fifty modern torpedo boats, all submarines, and must break up all war vessels and submarines under construction. All Germany's fighting ships in Allied hands are surrendered. Germany must sweep up the mines in the North Sea and the Baltic, and must raze the fortifications guarding the Kiel Canal. No more wireless stations may be constructed. Germany cedes to the Allies fourteen of her principal cables. Germany may not retain army aviation grounds within 150 kilometers of her frontiers, she must surrender all military aeronautical material except 100 seaplanes, and may not manufacture any aircraft or parts for six months.

All German prisoners who so desire are to be repatriated without delay, but selected German officers may be retained until Germany surrenders persons guilty of offenses against the laws of war.

The Allied and Associated Powers publicly arraign William II of Hohenzollern, not for an offense against criminal law, but for a supreme offense against international morality and the sanctity of treaties. The surrender of the ex-Emperor is to be requested of Holland, and a special tribunal for his trial is to be set up by the five great powers. (The request on Holland was reported to have been made on May 12). Germany must hand over to the Allies for trial all persons accused of acts in violation of the laws and customs of war, to be tried by military courts.

Under Section VII, the Allied Governments affirm, and Germany accepts, the responsibility of herself and her Allies, for causing all the loss and damage suffered by the Allied Governments and their nationals as a consequence of the war. The total to be paid by Germany in reparation is to be determined by an Interallied Reparations Commission, which is to give a fair hearing and report not later than May 1, 1921. The sum thus determined shall be liquidated by payments covering thirty years. All cash and other articles of Allied ownership taken by Germany, and which can be identified, are to be returned. Germany must pay within two years, 20,000,000,000 marks, either in gold, goods, ships, or other special forms of payment, and Germany assumes and agrees to pay—in 5 per cent. gold bonds due in 1925—Belgium's debt to the Allies.

Germany is to issue bonds at once for 20,000,000,000 marks payable not later than May, 1921, for 40,000,000,000 marks bearing interest at 2½ per cent. until 1926 and 5 per cent. thereafter, and is to agree to another issue of 40,000,000,000 marks at 5 per cent. under terms fixed by the commission. Germany's domestic loans if revenues are insufficient for both are to step aside until these bonds are paid.

Germany agrees to replace, ton for ton, all Allied shipping lost or damaged by acts of war and in part payment cedes to the Allies all her ships of 1600 tons gross and upwards, one-half of ships from 1000 to 1600 tons and one-quarter of her fishing fleet. In addition Germany agrees to build for the Allies 200,000 tons of ships a year for five years. Germany will make good her damage to the coal and other Allied industries by delivering certain amounts of coal, coal tar products, dyestuffs and chemcals to be specified by the Reparations Commission.

One of Uncle Sam's big sea planes

Germany is also obligated to restore the library at Louvain by handing over manuscripts, rare books prints, etc., to the equivalent of those destroyed, and is required to restore various stolen goods, including the Koran of the Caliph Othman taken from Medina and the skull of the Sultan Okwawa, taken from East Africa.

Germany also confirms the renunciation of the treaties of Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest.

Under Section VIII Germany may not increase any of her tariff duties for six months nor those on certain articles for 2½ years more. . . . Germany agrees to frain from unfair commercial competition. International postal, telegraphic and railway conventions with Germany are renewed. Provision is also made for the resumption of commercial relations.

Section IX provides for international regulation of the opium traffic and for the protection in their property of religious missions in former German territory ceded to the Allies.

Section X permits Belgium to build a deep draft Rhine-Meuse Canal within 25 years. Germany agrees to establish through railway service between the Allied and other states, and to make her rolling stock conform to Allied standards and to assure Czechoslovakia access to the sea at Hamburg and Stettin, and Czechoslovakia is also to have rail access to Fiume and Trieste. The Kiel Canal is to be free and open to war and merchant ships of all nations at peace with Germany.

Section XI gives Allied aircraft full liberty of passage and landing over and in German territory.

Section XII provides for freedom of transit of merchandise across Germany, internationalizes the rivers Rhine, Elbe and Oder, and possibly the Niemen, and reestablishes the Danube Commission.

Section XIII establishes a permanent organization to promote international adjustment of labor conditions, to consist of an international labor conference and an international labor office. Labor is not to be regarded as a commodity or article of commerce, the right of association is recognized for both employer and employed, a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life is recognized as just, as is the eight-hour day, the 48-hour week, the weekly rest of 24 hours, the abolition of child labor and the assurance of education and proper physical development to children, equal pay for equal work as between men and women, equitable treatment of all workers, including foreigners, and a system of inspection in which women should take part.

Section XIV concerns itself with guarantees of performance, authorizes the continued occupation of the Rhine country by Allied troops for fifteen years, but provides for progressive evacuation of occupied territory after five years, if the peace terms are carried out.

Section XV binds Germany to recognize the validity of treaties concluded by the Allies with her former allies, and to accept the decrees of Allied prize courts. The treaty is to become effective as to any power on the date of deposition of its ratification.

Mr. Hughes described lynching as a manifestation of the Hun spirit, and declared that the country owed it to the negroes who served in the war to abolish the practice forever.

Ex-Governor O'Neil of Alabama declared that lynching could be ended by vesting in the Governors the power to remove sheriffs who permitted criminals to fall into the clutches of the mob.

TO FREE BELGIUM. Representatives of Belgium, France, England and Holland, in a meeting soon will determine the conditions which will replace the treaty of 1839. The Incorruptible Crown!

*A SERMON BY EDGAR DEWITT JONES, D.D.

TEXT—Rev. 19 : 12. "On his head were many crowns."

THE twenty-two chapters of the book of Revelation are as so many apartments in some gorgeous Alhambra, with every room splendidly appointed and some beautiful beyond description. To read this book is to pass from room to room, from glory unto glory; and as one passes into the nineteenth room he needs must remove his shoes, for he is on holy ground. Amidst surpassing glories, the seer beholds a vision of the Christ who reigneth forever more. His vesture is dipped in blood, his eyes are as flames of fire, and on his head are many crowns.

"Crown him with many crowns,
 The Lamb upon his throne;
Hark how the heavenly anthem drowns
 All music but its own."

The writers of the Bible employ this word "crown" frequently. Broadly speaking, the word in the Scriptures has two meanings: the insignia of authority, and the token of victory. In this text the reference is to a kingly crown, a diadem, a symbol of sovereignty. But for the larger part, the crown in the Holy Scriptures is the garland woven from some growth of the field and bestowed either as the victor's prize in an athletic contest, or worn as the badge of a guest on some festal occasion.

As one goes through the Tower of London the attendant will point out some of the crowns of royalty jeweled with rarest gems and worth a king's ransom. In the galleries of the Holy Scriptures there are several kinds of crowns on exhibition. All are interesting, but all are not of equal value.

There is the "corruptible crown," the crown whose glories soon dim, the crown which flashes but for a season and then goes out in darkness. Isaiah refers to the crown of pride and to the fading flower of Israel's glory, the pride of conquest, and her wild revelries. The apostle Paul refers to the crowns or wreaths that were won by the contestants in the athletic games of Corinth as "corruptible crowns"; their beauty could not last, their leaves soon withered. There is something mournful and pathetic about withered flowers, especially those that have been worn upon some festive occasion—a celebration, a banquet, or a wedding.

"Corruptible crowns"—crowns that perish, crowns that fade away. The so-called prizes of life, which are right enough in themselves, when made the chief goals of life only disappoint, and in the end bring ashes instead of beauty. The crown of pleasure as the acme of life is certain to crumble and decay. Place and power and wealth—all the prizes the world holds dear—are in themselves crowns that perish in pride and pain.

THEN there is the "soul-winner's crown." In Philippians, fourth chapter and first verse, the apostle Paul writes, "Wherefore, my brethren, beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my beloved." The apostle is referring to his converts in the Philippian church; he speaks of them as his crown, he calls them his joy. In the midst of his hardships on sea and land and his perils in city and wilderness, the memory of the men and women whom he has led to Christ were as a crown of joy to that great servant of the Christ.

The "soul-winner's crown"—what an incomparable crown it is! Only those who possess this crown can estimate its worth. The peace that passes understanding comes through leading men and women out of darkness into light, out of the bondage of sin into the glorious liberty of Jesus Christ. What jeweled crowns some human beings wear! Some there are who have helped to guide the feet of little children along the way that Jesus walked. What radiant crowns are yours! The "soul-winner's" is the preacher's supreme crown. Fame, oratory, prominent pulpits, brilliance—what are they but corruptible crowns? Their luster soon tarnishes, their glory fades; but the true servant of the Gospel prizes above all else the memory of the men and women he has helped to see God in Jesus Christ. In times of stress and experiences of disappointment, he can recall by name men and women, young and old, whom he brought into the blessed fold, and whose growth in grace and knowledge of the Christ he watched. Fame, prestige, and popularity will fade away; but the memory of souls won for Christ will grow more glorious with the flight of the years.

Is it possible that there are professed followers of the Christ who are still strangers to the "soul-winner's crown"? Can it be that there are those who have come into a fellowship where every convert receives a great commission to make other disciples, and yet who know nothing about the convert's crown?

There is also the thorn crown. Jesus wore that crown. It was rudely placed upon his brow by his enemies. Matthew says the soldiers of the governor took Jesus into the palace and the whole band gathered about him there, stripped him and put on him a scarlet robe, a crown of thorns upon his head, a reed in his right hand, and, kneeling down before him, cried, "Hail, King of the Jews!" They struck him on the head with the reed and spat upon him. Mark and Luke record the same in substance; and John tells us that the soldiers platted a crown of thorns and put it on his head, and arrayed him in a purple garment, and that Pilate led Jesus out before a multitude wearing that crown of thorns.

THE pictures of the crucifixion invariably show the crown of thorns, pressed down upon the brow of Jesus, the skin cut by its jagged points, the blood trickling down the calm face in tiny rivulets. The crown of thorns—Jesus wore it! It was thrust upon his head, he had to wear it.

"Under an eastern sky,
Amid a rabble cry,
A man went forth to die
 For me!
Thorn-crowned his bleeding head,
Blood-stained his weary tread,
Cross-laden he was led,
 For me!"

The crown of thorns! Who among the sons of men can escape it? None! Absolutely none! Popularity cannot insure us from it. In fact, popularity which depends upon the fickleness of the people may crease the certainty of it. Reflect on the lives public men. Usually our Presidents enter upon th high office with the good wishes of all political part everybody praises them; and for possibly a year t are extraordinarily free from censure. Then co the crown of thorns. They cannot escape The vital and all-important thing is that the c of thorns come in the discharge of duty, in fidel to truth, for by and by such a crown becomes soft, fragrant, and beautiful garland—the vict wreath!

There is yet another crown of which the Testament writers loved to speak—"the crown approval"—Christ's crown. Sometimes it is spok of as the "crown of life," sometimes as the "crown glory," sometimes as a "crown of righteousnes It is all three, and more! From his prison cell Rome, Paul wrote: "Henceforth there is laid up me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, righteous judge, shall give to me at that day, not to me only, but also to all them that have lov his appearing." In Revelation, second chapter, ten verse, these great words are put in the mouth of t Christ himself: "Be thou faithful unto death, an will give thee a crown of life."

POETRY and romance halo the commenceme season. Whether university, college, academ high or ward school, commencement ceremonies a impressive, inspiring, yet not without an element pathos. There are the young men and women wi sparkling eyes, with the vigor of youth, the flower the white dresses, the music, the speeches, the sal tatory, and the valedictory; and at last, the present tion of the diploma and announcement of honors.

God has a graduation day for his children. Wh is it? Paul thought of it as death. Peter believed to be his martyrdom. "Be thou faithful unto deat and I will give thee a crown of life." When old Colonel Newcome, Thackeray's lovable hero, came t the end of life, and the sands ran low in the hourglas he fancied himself again a boy at that quaint Englis school where at roll call instead of saying "Present, they said "Adsum"—"I am here." The great graduation day had come; God's commencement day wa at hand for the Colonel. From some vast distanc there issued a mighty summons; it was the callin of the roll. The Colonel raised himself upon on elbow, and, in answer to the voice that he alon heard, he cried with his last utterance, "Adsum!" "I am here!"

The crown of approval—Christ bestows it. It incorruptible; its glories are fadeless; it is a crown o righteousness and of victory.

John the Beloved has left ajar the gate into th throne room of heaven. Behold the regnant Christ "On his head are many crowns," the crown of God approval, the diadem of authority, the garland of vi tory, the coronet of Saviourhood. Hasten the da when to Christ's many crowns may be added st another—that of world sovereignty, when every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord.

"Come then, and, added to thy many crowns,
 Receive yet one, as radiant as the rest,
 Due to thy last and most effectual work,
 Thy word fulfilled, the conquest of the world."

The Religion of Julia Ward Howe

MRS. JULIA WARD HOWE one day in Jerusalem, in 1879, forty years ago, found herself surrounded by a mob of beggars, unwashed and repulsive, clamoring for money. She was bewildered by the tumult and pressure of the crowd. Suddenly there appeared a young man in spotless white, who scattered the mob, took her horse's bridle and offered to lead her to her hotel. "It was," she said in telling the story, "as if an angel had stepped into the narrow street."

"Who are you, dear youth?" she cried.

"I am a Christian!" was the reply.

In Egypt she was greeted by pupils of the American Mission, one of whom quaintly said to her, "I also am Christianity!"

Mrs. Howe cared little for doctrines. Her faith was one which outran creeds and made her at home in any pulpit. "This seems like the millennium," she said in reference to a public meeting on behalf of the Filipinos at which Catholic, Jew, Episcopalian, and Unitarian were the speakers. She predicted the final unification of the world church.

The golden thread of high spiritual aspiration runs through all Mrs. Howe's poetry. Her deep religious impulses made her a reformer and a patriot; an opponent of war; a champion of the oppressed; and a powerful advocate of woman's cause, to which she devoted much valuable time and effort for over four decades.

She was a persuasive and winsome figure on platform and in pulpit. She regarded preaching as her "greatest privilege," and felt that in it she "had done some of her best work." In her addresses she urged impressively the world's need of spirituality. "Without religion," she said, "you will never know the real beauty and glory of life; you will perceive the discords, but miss the harmony; you will see the defects, but miss the good in all things."

At her ninetieth anniversary, in 1909 (a year and a half before she was translated), she feelingly and humbly said:

"I, for one, feel that my indebtedness grows with my years. And it occurred to me the other day that when I should depart from this earthly scene, 'God's poor debtor' might be the fittest inscription for my gravestone, if I should have one. So much have I received from the Great Giver, so little have I been able to return!"

What They Think of a League of Nations

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"WHAT do you think of the League of Nations?" It's a question that all of the civilized world has been asking for the last five months.

"Do you think that the idea of it is worth while? Do you think that it's a solution to the great problem that humanity is facing? Or do you think that it is the too vague dream of an ealist, this vision of universal brotherhood?"

I heard the question echo through France. I ard it in Germany and in Belgium. And finally, er hearing it many times, I began to ask it myself. "What do you think of the League of Nations?" I say to the most casual acquaintance on a train. What do you think of the League of Nations?" I'd k the slangiest of doughboys. "Is the League of tions practical?" I'd question the statesman and e journalist.

T WAS in Charleroi, sitting across the luncheon table from the manager of a great factory, that I st asked the question.

"What do you think of this League of Nations!" I ked abruptly.

The manager of a great factory stroked his care-lly trimmed Vandyke beard before he answered me. nd then—

"It's hard," he said in his precise English, "for foreigner to judge. But—well, I have for so long rked in a factory that I feel almost a part of the e that goes on in a factory. I think as the men who rk under me think, I plan as they plan, I dream as ey dream. And I believe what they, my laborers, lieve.

"The League of Nations may be a splendid ing—yes! It is a splendid thing. But no venant can ever be drawn up—no covenant at will effect the peace of a world—unless the orkers of the world have their hand in the mak- g of it. No group of diplomats with white, ell-cared for fingers can sit around a table and aw up a paper that will bring light out of chaos. he men with toil-stained fingers must have their are in it.

"You see," the manager of a great factory was roking his beard again, a bit nervously, "I think s the men who work under me think. And they y that a real League of Nations, if there ever is e, must be planned by a committee selected om the workers of the world—the men who rn their livelihood in factories and machine ops and mines."

So spoke the manager of a great factory.

THE girl who drove a motor ambulance was smearing black grease on the axle of her car hen I spoke to her. She did not raise her eyes s she answered, but her tone was vehement.

"I thought, at first," she told me, "that Wilson as wasting time, sailing back and forth across he ocean. I thought that his League of Nations as almost like a big publicity game. But since 've been here, since I've driven over French oads and made detours around French battle-elds—since I helped give first aid to some peas-nts and took others to the hospital for treat-ment I've gotten a different idea of the situation.

"It's childish to turn away from the really reat thought of a really great mind. It's more han childish—it's foolish. And Wilson's League f Nations is a really big thought. Seeing France nd what has happened to France, I know how uch something like the League of Nations eally is needed. I know that Wilson had to come o Europe!

"It seems to me that our country is standing ike a wonderful lighthouse before the world. nd it seems to me that the smaller nations—elgium and Poland and Serbia and the rest—are ike tiny ships that are drifting toward the rocks f war. And this great and idealistic plan is the amp that will be set in the lighthouse—the lamp hat will guide those little ships to a safe harbor. Mr. Wilson isn't being foolish or impractical. He as had a vision that he is willing to back against he ridicule and unbelief of the world!"

And the girl who drove an ambulance rubbed a reasy little hand on a piece of cotton waste and went on with her work.

THE French statesman was reading a splendid old poem, muttering some phrases of it under his breath, when I walked, quite unan-nounced, into his drawing-room. He rang, ab-sentmindedly, for tea, and went on with his reading while I seated myself on a low stool in front of the fireplace. The French statesman doesn't have to be polite to his guests—he is too well known.

It was only when the tea arrived that I inter-rupted the reading of the poem. I interrupted rather abruptly.

"What do you think of the League of Nations?" I questioned, as I tilted the teapot over a shimmering china cup—"do you like it?"

The French statesman looked up, holding a finger between the pages of his beloved book, to mark the place, as he spoke.

"What do I think of the League of Nations?" he answered. "Me—I am a Frenchman! And, sometimes, your Mr. Wilson is not easy for a Frenchman to understand. But I think—I think—he has a great idea. It is perhaps a little thick—as yet. Perhaps one would choke over the swallowing of certain phrases of it.

"What, for instance, if Germany should invade again? Could we stop her with this League of Nations before she had set her devastating foot upon French land? No; we could not! America is too far away to force a quick enough action.

"The League of Nations is a dream—a splendid dream. But it will—how do you say it—scarcely hold together."

And then the French statesman asked for another lump of sugar and dropped his book as he was stirring his tea, and said something very explosive in his own language.

IT WAS on a train that I met the Flemish millionaire (at least he looked and talked like a millionaire). When I questioned him, as I had questioned the others, he became suddenly serious. And then he spoke.

"Your President is an earnest man," he told me; "no one, reading his plans, could doubt for a moment his sincerity. He wants to help the world to be a better place. Of that I am sure.

"Some of my people do not understand him. But some of your people do not understand him, either. And the ones who do not understand him cannot understand his motives. They cannot understand that a man might be altruistic enough to plan a big-souled movement to perpetuate peace. Too idealistic, they say. And they laugh in their sleeves as they say it. But me—I do not laugh."

SOMEWHERE in Germany the American doughboy sat on the edge of a table and swung his feet and chewed chewing-gum. A scowl lay across his face, for the United States mail was in, and there weren't any home letters for him in the fat brown bag.

"League of Nations?" he snorted when I, a bit tactlessly, brought up the subject. "They make me sick with their League of Nations—that's what!

"Lookit me! I've been away from home for a year—I have. And I wanter go back. I don't wanter sit here until I die o' old age—a listenin' to a langwitch that I can't make head nor tail of. I wanter go home where they have sugar cookies and apple pie and mothers and real coffee! I wanter go home.

"League of Nations, you say? Whatta I think of it? I don't think anything of it a-tall. I don't know what they're gettin' at. But I'd understand it if they signed peace, and I'd understand travel orders. I'll tell th' world that I'm fed up on conferences."

So spoke the American doughboy before I, more or less skilfully, led the conversation back to professional baseball.

HE WAS an Italian merchant—in the manufacture of perfumes, he told me. He was more upset, apparently, over the high cost of the materials that he worked with than he was over the war and the honors of war—for he was all business man.

"I," he answered when I asked my question of him, "I know so little politics—an' the rest of it. I know so little of what statesman do. My boy, he was keeled when Italy first enter the war—since then I have not cared. I have jes' worked at my trade. I have made perfume—I have no othair interest now.

"League of Nations—it is a pretty idea—yes. But it seems to me that some day it will lie like a broken bubble at the feet of your President, who have dreamed it. It seems to me that he does not quite understand the hearts of men or the minds of men. But how shall I give an opinion? I make perfumes.

"The othair day one of my workmen invented a new scent. He made a mixture of flowers that was quite new—and as lovely as the springtime. I was all enchanted, but, when we test it, we find that it is not lasting. It was sweet for a short time—oh, very sweet—an' then it was nothing. We could not use it!

"An'yet——, my workman have the foundation for something more than good—if we can discover what his formula lacks!"

OH, I talked to ever so many people about the League of Nations. I talked to the newspaper reporter who couldn't get a thrill out of it, and to the poilu who groped vaguely for the idea back of it. I talked to the college professor who applauded it, and to the budding Bolshevist who sniffed at it. I talked to the boy who had run away from boarding-school to play the war game, and I talked to the Y. M. C. A. woman. I talked to the preacher who had used it as the inspiration of a sermon, and to the cartoonist who had laughed at it with his clever pencil. And then, last of all, I talked with the little French widow whose husband had died for France, and whose two sons, following in his brave lead, had died too.

"War," sighed the little French widow. "War have taken my sons. War have taken my—mari. War have taken the light from out of my eyes—an' the joy from out of my soul.

"An' so if your M'sieu Wilson have foun' a way which he theenk will stop war—why may we not try it? No one else have offer any other plan. It may not be wort' while, thees plan of hees, it may fail. But these failure weel be a grand failure. An' it may succeed."

The little French widow paused. Just a shade unsteadily she walked to the window and looked out across the gracious sloping lawn of her home. The hand that she laid upon the window sill trembled.

"Oh, how can they laugh at it—those people who mock?" she cried suddenly. "How can any one not view weeth reverance any plan that may make war to cease? I—the heart of me is broken into four parts. One part of it is lonely in my bres'. The othaire parts are lying burried in t'ree graves. I would not want any othaire woman's heart to be so broken.

"An' this League of Nations—it may keep other women's hearts boun' together by cords of love an' peace. So it is wort' trying—n'est ce pas?"

THE SHIP SPEAKS

By Margaret E. Sangster

THEY have taken my strongest timbers out
  Of the highest cedar tree,
They have made my frame of the finest steel;
  But the valiant heart of me
Is something they could not hew or weld,
  Is something they could not make;
For the heart of me is the Nation's heart
  That no war-lord's curse may break!

Ah, men have worked that my gleaming prow
  May challenge the wind and tide;
They have toiled in the heat of the summer sun,
  That my graceful length may glide
Through the swirling might of the ocean wave;
  They have given me to the sea.
And because they have worked for the Nation's soul,
  They have built that soul in me!

Germany's Day of Reckoning

IT CAME on May 7. Not, indeed, the kind of day she had boasted of for years before the war, and which was toasted at many a festive gathering in the Fatherland, but a day of judgment for her crimes against the world. As though to make the hand of retributive justice still more evident, the day when the verdict was rendered against the German nation was the anniversary of the Lusitania tragedy, the most wanton crime that ever was perpetrated upon a people with whom the aggressor was not at war. Thus it happened that while Americans at home were observing memorial services in their churches, the verdict of the most august judicial assemblage ever known in history was being delivered to the German delegates at Versailles. The Treaty of Peace framed by the Allies was the world's judgment against the offending nation.

Germany is rendered impotent by the treaty; her army is reduced to 100,000, her navy to 15,000; conscription is abolished. For forty miles east of the Rhine, all fortifications must be leveled to the ground, never again to be rebuilt. Her navy will be a mere half-dozen battleships and a few light cruisers and torpedo boats. She can have no submarines or military and naval aircraft. Her Heligoland forts will be razed to their rocky base. Her fourteen submarine cables are taken from her. She loses Poland and also her vast colonies in Africa and the South Seas. Alsace-Lorraine is restored to France and the Sarre basin and Danzig are internationalized. She must not fortify the Baltic and she must pay, ton for ton, for shipping unlawfully sunk, by ceding a large proportion of her own merchant fleet. She is assessed for all damages sustained by the Allies and the associated governments, and she must reimburse civilian damages by an initial payment of 20,000,000,000 marks ($5,000,000,000), the remainder to be computed later and liquidated at regular intervals.

Further, she must restore all that her armies have stolen during her orgy of pillage in Belgium and France—books, pictures, furniture, machinery. At any time the League of Nations may summon her for any violation of the treaty, for the League itself is now made a permanent institution. With more leniency than Germany would have exercised had she won the war, the Allies have agreed, if she observes the terms of the peace treaty faithfully, to give her opportunity for the restoration of her industries and commerce. Her future, therefore, depends upon the faithful performance of her obligations under the treaty, and the observance of the principles laid down by the League of Nations, in which, however, she has no membership at present. Finally, she must agree to the trial of the ex-Kaiser for his crimes, by an international court to be provided by the Allies.

The situation is a grave one for the whole German people. Their future national existence depends upon the good faith with which they—the German people—meet these demands. Germany's burden is onerous, it is true; yet the justice of the demands formulated by the court cannot be questioned. Had the destinies of war been reversed, had Germany been victor, her terms would have spread terror throughout Europe and the whole civilized world. These statements are not conjectural, but a logical inference from the declarations made by her own leaders, from the Kaiser down, during the years when she seemed to be on the high road to victory.

Looking back over the long struggle, who can now doubt for a moment that divine justice has guided the issues through it all? But for America, Germany could have succeeded in wrecking civilization. View it as we may, the conclusion is inevitable that this nation of ours assumed its greatest task, and carried out its highest mission, when it entered the war and became the means of saving the world for humanity and justice.

Why Forget the Children?

IT IS by no means improbable that the next reform to enlist national sympathy and support will be for the freedom and protection of American childhood and the recognition of natural rights which ought to be inalienable. Child labor is still with us and is a positive evil. We may have a long way yet to travel before the exploitage of American children becomes a thing of the past.

A Federal judge in North Carolina lately declared unconstitutional the tax which has been imposed on the products of child labor in interstate commerce. Of course, there will be no delay in taking the matter up to the Supreme Court; and if it should uphold the decision of the lower court, it is not difficult to foresee a campaign for the adoption of a constitutional amendment safeguarding the rights of children in this republic. If our state and Federal courts cannot be persuaded to take a rational and just view of what is due to American childhood, no other course would seem to be open. It may be noted here that the treaty of peace pledges the nations to the elimination of child labor.

In some countries, industrial exploitation of children has been carried to such excess that whole populations have deteriorated. Shall we wait until we have a generation of physical inefficients, or shall we save them now? The child should be the care of the state during those tender years when the little bodies may be dwarfed and stunted and vital stamina weakened, and opportunities for education recklessly sacrificed in order that business may thrive and competition prosper. Are we so mercenary that we can continue this slaughter of the innocents? We are leading the world in the paths of justice and striving to give full recognition to the industrial classes. Why should we entirely forget the claims of the little people of today, who are to be our men and women of tomorrow?

Italy's Poet-Patriot

WAR has made poets, but Italy has a poet who has made war. Before 1915 few of us knew of Gabriel D'Annunzio. He had won fame at home with his passionate verse, he was recognized among literary men abroad, but the man in the street knew him, if at all, merely as another poet. But, even as Whittier in the days before the war of the sixties played his harp upon the one string of human freedom, so from August, 1914, until Italy's declaration of war, D'Annunzio played upon the string most vibrant in the Italian heart, "Italia Irredenta." He saw clearly the sinister purpose of German aggression, he visioned Italy's duty and opportunity, and when at last Italy wavered no longer, and the war was on, he enlisted in the Flying Corps and wrote his name on the clouds, as he had already inscribed it on the hearts of all Italy. He became the terror of the air to the Austrians, brought down their greatest pilots, bombed their best-defended positions, blew up their stores, and, near the end, celebrated his apparent immunity to Austrian harm by bombarding Vienna with pamphlets telling of Austrian disaster and of the food that would follow surrender.

With the war ended, D'Annunzio was hailed as "Italy's own" from the now extended top of the boot to Sicily beyond the projecting toe. As the Peace Conference deferred decision on Italy's desires, his burning eloquence kept aflame the fire of Italian purpose. For him all land was Italy where Italians lived, and Fiume was Italy's and could not be otherwise. On May 5 he addressed a great company of his fellow citizens in Rome. He pleaded for the realization of Italy's utmost ambition across the Adriatic, he pictured the Italian hands held out across the sea to the mother country, and, rising to a climax which carried his audience into an ecstacy of agreement, he declared that every son of Italy who had died for the unredeemed peoples had consecrated the cause with his blood, and that every living Italian was bound to stand, with every other, steadfast and united until Italy's desires were granted. "Listen!" he cried; "do you not hear the tramp of an army on the march? The dead are coming more swiftly than the living. All along the route they find the footsteps of those who went before them." And this plea rang out over the wires throughout Italy. It made such an impression that Premier Orlando called the poet-orator to his office, and D'Annunzio was said to be writing a new speech. Meantime the Big Three at Paris had decided that Italy should administer Fiume until 1923, when it should become fully her own.

The Courage of a Good Cause

IN THESE days of elation over the national triumph of Prohibition, we are apt to forget that Prohibition itself is 111 years old. Like many other great reforms, it had a humble beginning. Moreau village near Saratoga Springs in northern New York was its birthplace, and Dr. William J. Clark, a local physician, ushered it into the world. He had been powerfully moved by seeing the evils of drink in the majority of the homes he visited professionally, and witnessing the misery and suffering that followed in its train. This old-fashioned village doctor was the first American who had the moral courage not merely to protest but to undertake a crusade against alcohol.

He sought as an ally a kindred spirit, Pastor Lebbeus Armstrong, and the two pledged themselves mutually to down John Barleycorn. It is told that old physician one day, after a specially hard exp ence in his rounds, pounded his way into the do nie's study and stirred that good man to action w the summons, fairly shouted at him: "Sir, we sl soon be a community of drunkards if something is done to check the spread of intemperance in t place!" So they looked into each other's eyes a clasped each other's hands, and, being mutua agreed, prayed over it for a moment and then down and made their plans.

Everything was against the success of such a c sade in those days, because drinking was univer but God was behind them, and the two reforme mocked as crazy by the neighbors, soon had t pleasure of seeing their plans make progress. Afte while they got a following, and the first Prohibiti meeting ever held in this country was called to or in an old tavern, the Mawney House, at which pioneer Prohibition society was formed, and t project launched for making Moreau "dry."

They were successful in pledging a good many the residents, but it was impossible to overco wholly the custom of drinking at public dinners. man a hundred years ago would have dared to tu his glass upside down on such an occasion. So Doct and Dominie had to bear with occasional social laps on the part of their followers; but they kept on plo ing and planting, until the seeds of sobriety and mor living overcame the weeds.

Moreau should not be forgotten, and the two r formers who had the grit and the vision to do wh these men did under such circumstances deserve to b held in lasting remembrance.

Keep Your Eye on the Light

AWAY out West in a little city there was a gan of boys who maintained a certain standard o bravery. A boy could go on their hikes an share their sports only when he had qualified by passing several tests. One of the tests of courage was th passage of a storm drain which ran from the foot of hill some 500 yards to a creek. It was of three-foot tile and straight after the first sixty feet. The initiat was put down the grating at the foot of the hill and told to crawl through to the creek, and to keep his eye on the light at the other end. It was easy to make that first 60 feet—enthusiasm and the spirit of adventure would carry the most timid that far—but the rest? How dark that long hole was, and how terribly far away the little round speck of light! Many a candidate, burdened with the overpowering dark, unable to concentrate on the light ahead, stopped half way and called lustily for help. But always from the start came reverberating down the long pipe the one commend, "Keep your eye on the light and crawl!" and from the spot of light another voice would answer, "Come on! Nothin's goin' to hurt cha!" And then at last the dark would begin to dissolve before the glow from the open end of the last tile. Oh, how fast a boy can sometimes crawl!

Often our life is shadowed, our way is dark, mysterious forces seem to hem us in, but God is sure. His promises never fail. If we keep our eye on the light of His word we will certainly come out into the full light of knowledge and the full joy of spiritual and material achievement. The Allies for fifty-two months fought through dark days with their eye always on the light of liberty and victory, which they saw in faith, nothing doubting. Job kept his eye on the light. Abraham also believed the promise and traveled far. David, though he hid in caves, and was a fugitive in his own land, never ceased to plead the promises and to cleave in spirit to the God of his fathers. And Jesus, except for the moment of agony on the cross, when the sin of a world came between, lived daily with his eye on the light of the Father's love. Press on, no matter what the present difficulty, and keep your eye on the light.

IN HONOR OF HEROES

Public Buildings Being Designed and Trees Planted as Soldier Memorials

A GREAT patriotic competition has been instituted throughout the land. The contest centers about the query, who will be first to suitably honor the heroic dead of the world war? The three great urban centers, Chicago, New York and Philadelphia, are foremost in this popular movement, which extends into every town and village. Pennsylvania and New Jersey are among the leading states to start state memorials of a permanent and valuable type.

The enthusiastic cooperation of the entire people speeds the progress of the soldiers' memorials. The number of good suggestions makes choice difficult in the big cities and populous states. In Philadelphia, for example, the propositions for memorials have included a memorial parkway with fine statuary along the Schuylkill River; a fine art gallery; a public university (which might also house the homeless City Board of Education); a great community house; a memorial bridge (across the Schuylkill to West Philadelphia); and a big convention hall of memorial character. The last plan has won the special favor of the united women's organizations, who have taken the matter in hand so energetically that this great need of the Quaker City will soon be supplied. It was decided that the present year, with the end of the war near, with enthusiasm over victory at its height, and the great numbers of unemployed owing to demobilization, was the best time to concentrate on the enterprise, which calls for a dollar from every Philadelphian.

The state of Pennsylvania, it is expected, will endorse the proposition of Governor Sproul and other state authorities for a magnificent bridge linking the Keystone State with New Jersey at Philadelphia and Camden. Some useful and conspicuous public work of this sort is regarded as the best type of a war memorial. The Pennsylvania legislature is asked to exercise a sort of artistic control over the statues, buildings and other memorials (which are proposed everywhere in the state in honor of the events and the heroes of the world war) by the appointment of a State Art Commission to safeguard the public from inartistic tombstone cutters, "marble butchers" and graveyard decorators.

The problem of bad taste in memorials, it is felt, is really a national one, the multitude of existing "marble atrocities" (which began to dot the land at the close of the Civil War) being evidence. Pennsylvania is not the only sufferer from this cause, New England, it is declared, being quite as full of "memorial monstrosities" as the Middle States, while the West and South follow on.

Pennsylvania has made a safe lead, however, in its "hero tree" and "hero grove" movement, which (inaugurated at the state capital in the fall of 1918) has started patriotic people everywhere to putting in the living tree memorial, with its felicitous touch of individual recognition (a tree for every dead soldier).

The beauty and value of this sort of memorial cannot be gainsaid. As a great naturalist has pointed out: "Trees have about them something beautiful and attractive even to the fancy, since they cannot change their places, are witnesses of all the changes that take place around them; and as some reach a great age, they become, as it were, historical monuments."

Besides, trees are the best sort of introductory memorial, for they provide a very lovely and desirable setting for other forms of memorial plans. This fact is emphasized by the American Forestry Association, which has actively promoted the "hero tree" idea and has started to keep a complete registration of all the trees set out as memorials from the accounts of the Memorial Tree Plantings sent to the association at its Washington, D. C., headquarters.

These sacred memorial trees everywhere will be angels of comfort and hope. They tenderly recall the lines of Joyce Kilmer, the poet who sacrificed his life for liberty:

> "A tree that looks to God all day,
> And lifts her leafy arms to pray."

New Jersey's idea of a memorial to its soldiers and sailors who fell in the world war (a great assembly-hall on state-owned property in Trenton, the state capital) has been heartily endorsed by the State House Commission, and is well on the way toward realization.

In connection with this memorial auditorium, which will seat 2,500 people, a great gallery is provided as a court of honor, divided into twenty-one sections (one for each county), for memorial exhibition purposes. Space is reserved in each section for a niche to contain a bronze tablet for the names of the dead heroes, for a permanent display of war relics that may be forthcoming, and for a war library of New Jerseymen enrolled in the war and of those who have made the supreme sacrifice.

The memorial propositions which find most favor in big cities are those of utilitarian purpose—bridges and great convention halls being in the lead. Bostonians hail the suggestion of a magnificent memorial bridge connecting Boston with Cambridge. New Yorkers have started to erect a grand permanent Memorial Arch of Freedom under a special committee appointed by the mayor. Chicago already has a beautiful memorial arch of temporary character in Michigan Avenue, containing all the names of Chicago's soldiers and sailors killed during the present war, as Labor's tribute.

In small towns and rural centers the memorializing zeal burns even more brightly. Towns long in need of a town hall are going to get it now, for the plan will go through successfully under the push of the patriotic impulse, by combined popular subscription and public appropriation. Soldier memorial playgrounds, public parks, libraries, hospitals, community buildings, drinking fountains, needed things combining beauty and utility, take precedence over the old-fashioned monuments which after a few years become passé, are often inartistic in composition, and even when beautiful are of no practical value in contributing to the needs of humanity.

In some places, as in Camden, N. J., there are planned both a memorial community building (at Market Street ferry on the Delaware River front) and a fine Court of Honor with pedestals upholding a soldier, a sailor and a marine. In other places (like Tamaqua, Pa.) patriotic societies unite with other groups in a memorial for all their soldier dead of all wars, of which, it is universally hoped, the recent world war is the last, as it was the greatest.

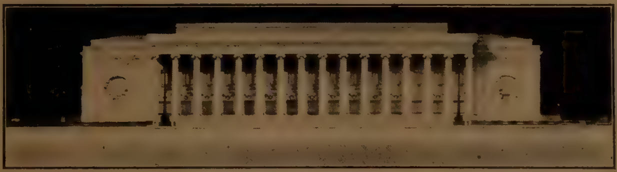
Washington Memorial Temple



OF ALL the plans now under way to erect monuments to the men who fought in the great war, perhaps the most imposing and feasible is that which would make of the George Washington Memorial Temple at Washington a joint monument to the men of '17 and '76. The men of 1917 have finished the task begun by the men of 1776, and have paid the debt incurred. The odd coincidence in numbers stands as the symbol of a real bond.

Washington borrowed of France the men and the money that saved the day for the freedom of the colonies. Wilson sent back to France the men and the money that saved the day for the freedom of the nations. We repaid Lafayette with Pershing.

There is a universal eagerness to build a fitting memorial to the heroes of the war of wars. Monuments will spring up all over the United States to individual men, officers, and organizations. But there is a desire for one great memorial. The logical place for it is, of course, the capital of the country.

The George Washington Memorial Association, which twenty years ago began raising funds to build an appropriate memorial to the first President, has $350,000 in cash. Congress has donated the grant of an ideal site, the tract of land formerly occupied by the Pennsylvania Station and now covered in part by the temporary buildings of the War Department. It is almost the only desirable site remaining unoccupied in Washington. Several years ago a dozen of the foremost American architects submitted designs in a competition arranged by the Memorial Association. The Committee of Award selected from these a plan of such impressive beauty as to silence criticism. Our entrance into the war interrupted the execution of plans which with a slight adaptation can be resumed and carried out to the attainment of the noblest memorial imaginable.

The design calls for a majestic structure 300 by 350 feet in length and depth and of a sufficiently commanding height. The main auditorium will seat not less than 7,000 people, and in addition there will be many smaller halls and over 100 reception rooms and offices.

There are to be rooms in the building for the perpetual use of certain patriotic societies, which have secured or can secure them by payment of $25,000. It is understood that the Society of Colonial Dames and one or two other associations already have raised the money, which will give them a habitation and a home in the city of Washington with every possible "annexed" facility for the holding of their conventions.

One wing of the building is to be the children's tribute to George Washington. This wing will be used for everything pertaining to child welfare, and it is the presumption that many gifts will be made for this cause in memory of children. Every child who contributes 10 cents receives a button carrying the legend, "This pin means a brick in the Memorial Building." The name of each child and of each donor of any amount will be entered on the records.

The auditorium, which will be the main feature of the building, is to be a memorial to the signers of the Declaration of Independence. Reference has been made to other halls in the building. These will hold from 600 to 2,500 people, and so it can readily be seen that conventions of minor size will be able to secure proper accommodations in this "structure of patriotism." In the banquet hall 600 people can be served at one time. Future inaugural balls will have a proper setting in this building. The third and fourth floors will contain a museum and library for the care of precious relics, souvenirs, and books on the art of war and the histories of our soldiers.

The George Washington Memorial Building is intended to meet the Father of his Country's wishes that Congress and the people should promote "institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge." It is intended that the structure shall be the meeting-place of all national and international conventions and all great public welfare gatherings. Nine-tenths of the conventions held in the city of Washington are in first measure educational in their intentions. There has never been a place for them to meet. This need will be met with what it is said will be the most beautiful building in the United States.

Getting the Young People

MANY churches have difficulties in getting the younger members of the Sunday school to remain for the preaching service. One pastor applied the following solution to his problem: A certain section of the church, several rows of seats at the front, is reserved for the Sunday school children. This is designated as the "Children's Church." They are made to feel that it is their duty to fill their "church" with a congregation that is as attentive as the congregation in the other part of the church. They have a specific part in the Sunday morning church service. They always sing a song or two, which is greatly enjoyed by the rest of the congregation. Then the pastor preaches a five-minute sermon to them. For the time being the grown-ups are forgotten, and the learned doctor delivers a message in such simple terms that the youngest child can understand. These simple, gripping five-minute sermons have an appeal for the grown-up congregation as well.

THIS contest is now finished. We thank you for your patience and good will. The war made it hard to secure competent help to do the careful checking of answer books required to insure correct and fair awards. The judges found decisions difficult, and their findings were delayed. The death of the former publisher caused further delay. But the new publisher pushed the work and here it is.

Checks are now being mailed to all of the successful contestants.

A Heart of Pity

SUNDAY. Col. 3 : 12. "Be clothed with compassion." I Peter 3 : 8. "Be pitiful." It is always deeply impressive to watch these strong men, Peter and Paul, so frequently and so highly exalting the virtue and grace of compassion. Both of them are very intense men, and intense men are often impatient and inconsiderate and painfully aggressive. But here the pushful are also the pitiful. They are burning with the fire of a mighty enthusiasm, and yet in all their strenuousness they are tender to frailty, and compassionate to the defeated and broken. This compassion is the fellowship of truth and grace. In their own degree the apostles reflected the glory of the Lord. "He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their name. . . . He healeth the broken in heart; he bindeth up their wounds." Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary!

Now, there is a sort of pity which is only an idle sentiment. It is not born of anything strenuous, and therefore there is nothing strenuous in its ministry. It is little else but a weak feeling. It is like exceedingly soft water which makes no bone. It is not like some mineral spring, full of medicaments and impregnated with vitality. It is not endowed with ministries which heal the sorrows and maladies of the soul. The great characteristic of vital pity is this: it is a means of spiritual restoration. A great deal of human pity fails to do anything in the depths because it has no relation or communion with the heights. It does not flow down from holiness, and therefore it is not a minister of spiritual healing. It is not truly wholesome because it is not truly holy.

Look at the heights where the compassion in my Pauline text is born. "Elect of God, holy and beloved, put on compassion!" The pity is born right away up in the sovereign sanctities of the divine vocation and the divine holiness and the divine love. It is like the glorious fulness of some Swiss river which rises in the lofty fields of virgin and everlasting snow. It is a river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. And just as a river carries the nature and influence of its birthplace in all its wanderings, being impregnated with the snow or the granite or the peat in which it was born, so this river of Christian pity carries in its heart something of the holiness and grace and love of God. Yes, it is our communion with the heights that gives us our power in the depths. Pity which is the child of holy passion is very pitiful. God's pity is infinitely tender and infinitely sweet. J. H. J.

Looking Into Things

MONDAY. James 1 : 25. "He that looketh into the perfect law, the law of liberty, and so continueth, . . . this man shall be blessed in his doing." It is one thing to look at a truth, and another thing to look into it. The verb the apostle uses here has within it the suggestion of stooping down to peer into a remote recess or a dark corner. So Christ's word for "seek" in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6 : 33) suggests keen vision and swift motion. James' word, "look into," gives one the idea of extreme care and humility. Humility? Yes, the humility of the woman who dropped a jeweled ring on the street, and saw it roll into the mud of the gutter. Without hesitation she stripped her gloves from her hands and fished with her bare fingers in the mud until she recovered the ring. Have we ever lost a valuable paper and suspected that it might have been carried out with the contents of a waste-paper basket? If so, we have not hesitated to empty a rubbish-bag and go through a pile of refuse in our desire to recover a prized letter or a bank check. It is so we are to seek the Kingdom of God. We are to seek it in unlikely places.

There was a high-born English woman, married to a clergyman, with a beautiful home, amidst refined surroundings, and with a charming circle of friends. There was laid upon that woman's heart a burden of anxiety for the welfare of outcast women. She wrestled in the dark with the problem of what she should do with her life and with her home. The spirit of Christ called upon her to sacrifice much for the sake of the lost sheep—the black sheep—of whose existence so many seemed to be in ignorance. One night her husband heard her tossing restlessly upon her bed. He said, "What is it you are worrying about, my dear?" She answered, "I must go after the lost sheep." He knew what she meant. They had talked it over. Then he made a great decision, which in point of heroism matched hers. He said, "My dear, all I have is at your disposal. I will back you up. Go after the lost sheep, and, if necessary, bring them here. I will welcome them. Whatever the cost, follow the Light." And she did. There were children in her home. Sometimes the children would say, as they were tucked into bed at night, "Mamma, who are all the ladies down stairs I heard you talking to?" And she would reply, "Darlings, they are some friends of mine; Jesus sent them here, and they may stay with us for a while. You must be kind to them, for they are friends of Jesus." C. C. A.

The All-Sufficient Grace

TUESDAY. II Cor. 12 : 9. "My grace is sufficient for thee." Grace is a free gift; it is divine favor from the heart of infinite mercy and boundless love, manifested in the human soul. Grace is the riches of God poured into the poverty of man. When all else fails, we may truly exclaim, "Thou remainest; thou art the same." Thy years and love shall not fail. The heavens shall wax old and perish, but thou, O Christ, art alive forevermore!

Is not such grace sufficient for thee in the midst of all ills, trials and difficulties? Grace is not medicine given for healing; it is the Physician himself. "I am thy healer; my presence will go with thee. Cast thy burden upon me; I will sustain thee." Christ does not go and come, like an earthly healer. He is with us always. We shall need his perpetual supply of grace in the ages immortal, just as we do here.

To be without Christ in great sorrows and struggles, we are filled with discontent, misery and despair; we cannot comfort or save ourselves. We are finite, He is infinite. He can make us perfect, as he is perfect, in moral loveliness. He cleanses the soul into whiteness, fills every longing vacuum, solves every mysterious problem of life. Is not his gracious presence better than removing little pains, obstacles and troubles? All his wisdom, power and holiness go with his grace. Is not the gold mine greater than the current coin? Is not the fountain better than the little drops poured into our cup of sorrow? E. W. C.

Choked With Pleasures

WEDNESDAY. Luke 8 : 14. "And as they go on their way they are choked with cares and riches and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection." The pastor of a church in the Middle West went over his list of members and found that a score or more did not attend preaching service with any regularity, and the majority of the members never attended the week day prayer service. He set about trying to find the real reason for the lack of interest, especially in spiritual things.

The minister finally succeeded in getting a frank expression of opinion from one of the young men, a college student, who said: "To tell the truth, pastor, our lives are so full of exciting and engrossing events that an ordinary church meeting does not interest us. We see the most thrilling moving picture shows, we go to the most professional scientific lectures; we hear the most cultivated singers; we are constantly rubbing up against the most enticing amusements. To tell the truth, all religious things seem pretty tame to us. The church services don't thrill us. The music is ordinary. There is no excitement about it all. It doesn't appeal to our senses."

But can the church in America furnish "thrills" to its members every Sunday? Is that the business of the modern minister? Must he run an amusement bureau to compete with the moving picture show?

Or is it the business of the people who are "choked with pleasures" to live such a simple and Christian life that the services of God's house are a delight to the mind and heart? Not even the seed of the Master sown in a "choked soul" surfeited with worldly pleasures can bring any fruit to perfection. It is a question worthy of serious answer how much the exciting pleasures of this age have "choked" the people so that they have no taste for the plain Bread of Life. C. M. S.

Seeking for Christ

THURSDAY. Acts 17 : 11. "Now these were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, examining the Scriptures daily, whether these things were so." Certainly no one ever had a better patent to true nobility than these Bereans.

Note carefully the two things in which their nobility manifested itself: (1) "They received the word with all readiness of mind." When they knew a thing really was the truth of God as revealed in his Word, they needed no urging to accept it, they received it at once with glad alacrity. Some people receive the truth when you compel them to: real lovers of the truth are hungry for it. (2) "They searched (or examined) the Scriptures daily whether these things were so." While they were ready to receive the truth, they insisted on being sure that what was taught them was the truth and that they had the mind of God for it; they regarded the Scriptures as the only final authority.

They were model Bible students in five respects:

(1) They studied the Sacred Scriptures "as the Word of God" (cf. 1 Thess. 2 : 13). (2) Then they studied "the Scriptures" themselves, not merely what some one had to say about the Scriptures: they were independent students of the Word, independent of men but dependent upon God. (3) They "examined (R. V.) the Scriptures." There was no superficial scurrying over the Scriptures, but a careful examination of them, comparing Scripture with Scripture, a determined attempt to find out exactly what they taught, and all that they taught. (4) They were systematic and regular in their study: they "examined the Scriptures daily." There is nothing more important in Bible study than that we be regular in our study and that we have a set time every day that is kept sacredly for the study of the Word. (5) They studied the Scriptures with a definite purpose, and with the very highest purpose, viz., to find out the truth about Christ and to find if the things Paul and Silas were teaching about him "were so." They did not waste their time in the examination of curious theories about the hum authorship of the various books of Old Testament; they studied what Scriptures had to teach about Christ

The Greatest Verse in the Bib

FRIDAY. John 3 : 16. "For G so loved the world that he gave only begotten Son, that whosoever lieveth on him should not perish, but ha everlasting life." Luther calls this ver "The Bible in miniature." In a ver containing about four lines we find t greatest truth of the whole Book. F here is told us the story of God and h love, Christ and his redemption. T rest of God's Word is simply an unfol ing and developing of the great though found in this text. We have here:

1. The statement of a great fac "God loved the world." It is som times hard for us to understand ho such a good God could love such wicked world. The one thing tha surpasses his power in this world is h love for the world. Whenever w think of a God whose power is infinit we must also think of a God whose lov is boundless.

2. Here is the expression of a grea Love: "He gave his only begotte Son."

Love always seeks expression. I must show itself in some adequate way A love as great as God's can only be revealed by a gift as great as Christ. God took the priceless gem of all the ages and gave to the world his only begotten Son. The need of man pierced the very heart of God and drew from His bosom the One he loved the best. This was an exhaustive manifestation of God's love.

3. Here is the revelation of a great truth: "That whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Faith is the condition on which man can be saved: "Whosoever believes shall not perish, but have everlasting life." Every soul can be saved; saved by the grace of God immediately and eternally; saved from the power of sin and the love of sin. W. W. B.

The Sinless Man

SATURDAY. John 8 : 46. "Which of you convinceth me of sin? And if I say the truth, why do ye not believe in me?" To prove Christ a sinner was the earliest aim of his Jewish adversaries, and this aim they pursued incessantly. It was not a meaningless, boastful challenge which the Lord issued to his audience, merely to disconcert them: they stood before him with a terrible determination in their hearts to do the very thing which he invited them to do. He had given them three years to collect their evidence against him, and when the closing trial came off at which the Holy One of Israel was denounced as a blasphemer and an anarchist, they were so utterly unable to establish their charges of sinful conduct against Christ that they had to suborn witnesses to bolster up their lying accusations. The frank challenge of the Lord in our text these wicked men can only meet with the mad cry: "Say we not well, that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?"

Sinlessness is an essential attribute of the holy God. Sinlessness was a characteristic also of Adam before the fall. In either view, as God and man, Christ is the Sinless One. He has been numbered with the transgressors for our sake, to carry out the eternal counsel of redeeming love. But as regards himself, he knew no sin; there was no sin in him; he was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners. It is necessary that we sink these facts deeply into our hearts, because the validity of his work as our Representative rests also on these facts. W. H. T. D.

THE SACRIFICE HIT

A Baseball Story in Which a Church Men's Club Wins Its Point by Losing a Game

ONTINUED FROM LAST WEEK

D now the Men's Class got down to steady practice. Garson had them already in hand, having pumped them hard that week, between the hatching of the conspiracy in the Class room and the springing of the trap on ay. Turnbull managed, by dropping an adroit ere and there, to get all the important team rs off afternoons. Garson's father readily to Turnbull's plea to let Alex get into a base- it again. News of the novel contest to come all through the busy mill town. With his raw al loaded into a hired truck, Garson shepherded ver the hills to Parsondale, twenty miles away, good day, for practice.

w, the batting order will be Garson, Turnbull, McCorkle, Brown, Pratt, with the fielders fol- ," Garson planned for them the first day they a conference on the Parsondale diamond before ing practice. "We must stick to that order. lders are not very good, but may serve to get a ck into the infield before the Tigers can turn hit into a home run. You fielders don't feel that bit of frankness, do you?"

; what we want is to win," the three raw rechorused.

t the idea. Now, listen. I figure I can hold gers to a few scattered hits. I and Turnbull only men who can hit Pug's fast balls, unless accident, and we don't want to depend upon ts to produce the result we're after."

," they agreed eagerly.

w suppose either I or Turnbull manage to get If it is me, Turnbull can hit out and try for . But the rest of you will stand a better chance ancing the cause if you'll try to bunt or make a e hit. You can no more swing hard and hit fast balls than you can fly—unless by accident. ret of a weak batter's hitting these fast pitchers ry to make the bat just meet the ball, instead iking hard at it. Then the ball, hitting the -held bat, will roll away for a bunt or go into a e hit that will advance the runner, even if the is caught at first. If you fellows can sacrifice third with two sacrifices, I'll take a chance on g home. If we can get in a score or two that omething else may come up to help us."

understand," Turnbull said; "now to work ness."

n, to the merry crack of bat against ball, the Class was practicing bunts and sacrifices, Gar- n the box, imitating Pug's rapid delivery as as possible.

r were the Tigers behind-hand in practice. Pug x was not long in getting word, through friends, at was taking place over in Parsondale. Perhaps tful Turnbull and the adroit Garson saw that he e word.

arson's got back into uniform again," Pug said orano, in explaining why he thought extra pracas needed; "we gotta go some to hit him."

e gotta go some to hit you, Pug," the sturdy n roller-tender praised.

Thus encouraged, Pug settled down to harder practice than before. The clan spirit was aroused and all through the hurly-burly element of the mill town the spirit of resistance to the Men's Class was aroused and the rougher elements of the mill workers promised themselves to be on hand, full force, to see that their men got a fair show from the umpire.

"We just gotta win," Pug said to his friends. "No ifs or ands about it; we gotta make good or quit town. Why, if any of those major league scouts hear I was outgamed by a college softy like Garson, I'd not stand a show with the big fellows ever."

"PLAY BALL!!" called Mayor Horace Watson, snapping his umpire's mask over his face and giving his breast-pad a last shrug into place. At the call the great crowd on the bleachers and in the grandstand of the Mill Company's recreation field stilled. One whole section of the grandstand and bleachers—that on the left—had been reserved for the Wilclox clans. On the right were the proponents of the Men's Class. It was midsummer; the big works were closed in honor of the occasion.

Pug Wilclox, first batter-up for the Tigers, strode confidently forward. He took his place with a smirk on his puckered-up phiz, and swung his bat tentatively. A ball whizzed over the plate at Garson's best speed.

"Strike one!" called Umpire Watson.

"Yah!" from the Wilcloxites.

"Ball one!" as the second one came.

"Yah! Yah!" from the Men's Class side.

"Strike t'u!" the next one brought forth.

Wilclox settled himself anew, tapped his heel-plate with his bat. The ball, seemingly straight for the center of the plate, came soaring up, slow, mystifying. Pug reached it. It broke, dropped, into Turnbull's big padded mitt.

"Three—and out!" the umpire called.

Pug slammed his bat down disgustedly and made way for Reilly, his left fielder, who likewise struck out. An easy fly disposed of Sanderson, the right fielder for the Tigers.

"Three out; side out!" called the umpire.

"Now for it," said Garson, as he went up from the Men's Class bench to the plate.

"Crack!" Garson, the trained college star, solved Pug's first curve for a neat base hit, laid almost down the third base line. Garson was easily safe before the ball, snapped over the diamond by Vargason, third baseman for Tigers, could field it over to Smithson, the lanky first sacker for his side.

Then Turnbull came up, to be struck out, as the minister, in the excitement of the contest, forgot instructions and swung to Pug's artful curves, to his sorrow. Garson scowled signals at the pastor, but Turnbull was bent upon having his own way and paid the penalty of severe chaffing from his own side as he went back to the bench at the right of the grandstand, and a chorus of "yahs" from Pug's friends capped his disgrace.

Scott heeded Garson's orders to seek for a bunt, but failed to make the little hit needed. McCorkle also failed. Garson had come back home, after a futile attempt to steal second, after Scott had failed, so the score was 0–0. The crowd's applause was divided for the two teams.

It was Willy Lambert, bat boy and youngest member of the Men's Class, who gave the news to the members of his team as they were getting ready to go to bat at the beginning of the third, with the score still at 0–0.

"I've been chumming over with little Bill Vernon, the Tiger's bat boy," he said, "and he tells me that Marvin Stallings, chief scout for the Cubs, is here to see what Pug can do. He has had good reports from him from the minor scouts and wants to see for himself. Pug is going to pitch his head off today, he says."

Garson whistled.

"He'll surely go better than ever now," he judged. "So far no one but me has hit his balls. But I'm holding them well, too."

Turnbull, Scott and the others nodded assent.

The Men's Class had batted around once, so it was Garson's turn to lead off again. Again he made a neat base hit and smiled over at Pug from first. Turnbull, following, was more cautious, but failed to lay down a successful sacrifice bunt. But Garson stole second and then third, by using his approved college-days sprint, and then died on third for lack of a hit to bring him in. But for revenge, he struck out three Tigers in a row and so ended the third inning, 0–0.

It was in the fourth inning that the Tigers, Morano leading with a hearty two-bagger, backed up by Reilly, left fielder, with a base hit scored. But in the fifth Garson came up, with two outs, and managed to make a two-base hit, which was backed by Turnbull with a sacrifice after Garson had stolen to third. From third Garson, on Reilly's error, stole and slid home, in a cloud of dust, but Pug's infield assist cut him down at the plate, by a hair.

The Men's Class infield and outfield were working like a well-drilled phalanx; the Tigers equally well. The crowd was silent for the most part. Even the Wilclox clans in the stands had begun to cheer the good plays of the "softies" of the Men's team, and Wilclox voiced open admiration for several difficult running catches made by McCorkle and Brill Scott. But so far none of the Men's had hit Pug save Garson alone. At the end of the first of the sixth, Garson having struck out six more Tigers, including the redoubtable Pug himself, in the fifth and sixth, the score stood 1–0, Tigers, still. Nor could Garson's men better it, although Turnbull and Scott each sacrificed him a base each, after he had made his customary hit, for which the crowd looked each time he came to bat. For although he got to third so assisted, he was cut down at the base when he led off too far, and Pug's lightning snap over to Vargason caught the ex-collegian fairly napping.

At the beginning of the seventh Garson was hailed by a bluff, keen-eyed stranger, who dropped over the rail of the grandstand to come to shake the hand of Alex.

"I'm Stallings, the Cub scout," he introduced himself, sitting down on the Men's Class bench; "let's talk a minute."

"All right," Garson grinned, after noting that, with his weak batters to lead off, his side had no chance that time at bat.

"This Pug fellow seems to have you boys all stoppe but you," Stallings laughed; "we want a hittin pitcher. I understand you're the same man who turned down the Cubs' offer for $2,000 a year as a try-out, with $5,000 a year if you made good, which you would have done, handily?"

"The same two-and-sixpence," Garson said, "but I'm settled down now and am out of baseball. This is only a little town game that I'm in for a play-spell, for a special reason. No hopes of me going into the professional ranks, sir."

"But this Pug! I was talking to him during his last leisure moment, when you were pitching the last inning and he was waiting his turn up. What do you suppose I told him?"

"I don't know."

"I told him if he could strike you out once, I'd give him his trial. He's not been able to do it yet. It is hard to gauge a raw pitcher by what he does against amateurs, as a good curve-ball thrower in a small town like this has all the other players frightened from the start. But if he got into the company of veterans, even of a minor league, he might go to pieces."

"Not Pug," Garson defended his opponent; "he's got iron nerve, Mr Stallings."

"He's got to prove it to me. It costs money to try out a new recruit. It's all right for him to strike out these small town folks. Your minister was an old-time college player, but he's out of practice and doesn't count like you do, Garson. I knew from your record and the reports we had on you during your three years at college you can hit this Pug every time, because you are noted for being able, not only to hit, but to hit the ball just where you want it. If he could strike you out just once, I'd give him the show he wants."

"Once in the big league, Pug will make good," Alex urged.

"I know, but he's got to get in first," grimly. "So far he has fielded fast, pitched hard and headily and piloted his team wisely. But he's got to strike you out before I'll notice his S. O. S. signals. The other little bunts and sacrifices that stand against him do not count. His black eye with me is that every time you, a real seasoned player, have faced him, you have scored a hit against him."

It was while the nines were changing places, at the beginning of the eighth inning, that Garson found himself passing Wilclox, coming in from the field. Pug accosted Alex:

"Say, Alex, what did old Stallings say? You know he's here to size me up on my showing in this game."

"He told me you had to strike me out to win the place on the Cubs you covet," said Alex with a grim jaw outthrust.

"Yeh, jus' that, Alex," with a note of odd feeling; "we were boy chums, even if my dad was poor and your'n rich. You always used me square. I don't see all you fellows are wanting in trying to beat us in this game this way; but you have your things you want, and we have ours. For me, I want that Cubs try-out. . . ."

"You win it, then," Alex snapped.

"Oh, I know it's lost, Alex. You can hit 'em when and where you want to and could be on the Cubs yourself, if you wanted to. Yes, next time up, you'll hit me and—then—" his voice broke in a little wistfulness that was almost an appeal.

Garson clenched his teeth and went out to pitch. He savagely cut down three Tigers with a speed that made Turnbull's eyes pod out and put him to all his skill in holding the fast collegian. But he did it.

Men's Club failed to score in that eighth. So it was still 1–0, Tigers, when the ninth began.

At the beginning of the ninth Pug himself led off. He made a gallant hit, with Morano following, but Garson pegged Pug out at third and Brill Scott, at third, snapped the ball over to McCorkle for a lightning double-play, holding Morano from going farther. A strike-out against Reilly ended Tigers' half of the ninth. Score, 1–0.

For Men's Class, Martin, one of the weakest hitters, led. To every one's surprise he just tipped the ball, and the pop-up fly was muffed by Bender, at short stop, and Martin just made first. Garson began now to coach like mad.

Pug made a dramatic pause. Several of Garson's team mates made derisive noises at him.

"Wait," Pug yelled; "you hear all o' this, now, fellows. When I got my men together after the game I tol' them what he'd done. We bucks weren't born yest'day. We know what you fellows been playing us for. You wanta get that pasture away f'um us Sundays to stop Sunday ball in this town. It's the only real level lot handy. We saw through your game and went determined to take your scalps and play ball there till ice froze on the river, to prove we could do it, spite of you, as we were not playing for money, being amateurs. But Garson's sacrifice to me has put another face on it. After I'd told the boys what he did, letting me have my chance, we agreed to turn over th' lease to you. I'll be gone, pledged to be sober th' rest o' my days. Th' Tigers will be here and they have agreed, in order to pay Alex, to give up their Sunday games, and attend your first open-air services."

"Going to give us a try-out at winning you?" Turnbull caught the ball of sportsmanship on the rebound.

"That's jus' it," Pug said, whacking his big fist down onto his upturned other hand for emphasis, his bull-like voice making the decorations overhead fairly to shake; "you lost th' game; you won th' thing you went after. . . . I got my chance—now we give you fellows your'n. . . ."

"Oh, Pug!" Alex called across table to him; "I played it that way. I knew you were a square dealer, for all your bluster and roistering. We were not pals to each other as boys for nothing, Pug."

"One thing," Pug warned them; "keep this part about Alex's sacrifice quiet until I make good with the Cubs, as I'm sure I can do."

They all agreed and the dinner wound up in a love feast of good fellowship of the true, Christian kind.

It was at the close of the last of the open-air services for that year, marked by the coming into the Men's Class of all the former Pug Wilclox clan, that Turnbull read for the information and edification of the huge body of perfected Christians part of Pug's last letter to him:

"Tell the fellows I'm going straight and I've made good, being already on the regular team at $5,000 a year, with a three-year contract, and a bonus promised if we go into the World Series and I do well in it.

"Remind Garson that he is the first ball-player that ever struck out and made a sacrifice hit at the same time. He struck out, sacrificed his own chances—seemingly—but won because his sacrifice made a hit with the Tigers."

"Three times three for Wilclox, even if it is Sunday," Turnbull proposed, and they were given with a reverent will.

Much of the time of the convention will be devoted to discussion of the many problems that are constantly arising in rescue work. These will be treated from every conceivable angle by the men who have given years of their life to mission work, and who are constantly studying how that work may best be done to produce the largest results for the Master's Kingdom. Each evening will be devoted to testimony meetings, when men who have been redeemed will tell their personal experiences,

Christian Unity Talk at Cleve

By H. K. CARROLL, LL.D.

THE notable thing about interdenominational gatherings today is the strong sentiment for Christian Unity. The Cleveland Conference of the Interchurch World Movement, April 30 to May 1, was no exception to this rule. From the beginning to the end, among the 500 men and women in attendance from some twenty-five denominations, the spirit of fellowship and cooperation was manifested cordially and enthusiastically.

The Interchurch World Movement began last November with a meeting called by Moderator Vance, of the Southern Presbyterian General Assembly, who, in view of the multiplication of "drives" for missionary funds, believed cooperation between the societies possible and desirable. In January, the outline of a plan for a united appeal to the churches was presented to the Foreign Missions Conference of the Boards of the United States and Canada and unanimously approved, and then to the Home Missions Council and other interchurch organizations, all welcoming the idea and promising support. More than a score of denominational boards have since endorsed it. Its announced purpose is "to present a unified program of Christian service and to unite the Protestant churches of North America in the performance of their common task . . . in meeting the unique opportunities of the new era."

The Conference at Cleveland was to report tentative plans for the carrying out of the cooperative movement. There was but one committee, that on Findings, the president being Dr. S. Earl Taylor.

Rev. Dr. J. Campbell White, formerly efficient head of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, began the proceedings with an enthusiastic address. He believed this as the greatest hour of Protestantism since Luther. Reunited Protestantism may undertake anything; divided Protestantism stands with palsied hands. Woodrow

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

Prevailing Faith

ABRAHAM believed in the Lord and his faith was counted to him for righteousness. And after Abraham had believed he talked with God and God granted his requests, warned him of threatening dangers, made more definite his promises regarding the power and glory of the nation that should spring from the yet unborn Isaac, and opened the doors of the centuries to show Abraham both the triumphs and the sorrows of Israel. Abraham prevailed with God through his unfailing faith. The history of men is marked in every century by the prevailing of men of faith. By faith men and women have borne sorrow, have endured persecution, have founded churches, schools and missions, and the records are full of the triumphs of faith that dared to step out into the unknown because God called. There is no cry of a human heart that is not heard and answered by the infinite Father above. There is no arm stretched out to do the work of his kingdom that is not strengthened by his power, and the medium is prayer. Abraham talked with God. He not only unfolded to God his own perplexities, he listened while God talked to him of His plans and spoke His promises.

The editor received a long letter the other day from a member of the Prayer League in which she told how she had been comforted when passing through deep waters, by the requests for prayer listed in these columns. She had gained faith to pray on because she found so many others needing the help she craved.

Among the requests that have come for prayer in recent weeks, all

The Poor Man's Club

By JAMES W. JOHNSON

THE saloon is the poor man's club, offering to him relaxation from work, the social attractions which are proper and normal to every one, and the entertainment which is healthful and desirable when the day's work is done. To eliminate all this and to substitute nothing for such worthy consideration is neither just, wise nor safe. "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy"; and unless Jack is offered opportunity for play, the result will be more than dullness to Jack. He will jump the traces and will resort not only to play but to license, vice and crime. Human nature is the same the world over. Its normal demands, common to all, must be met and satisfied either reasonably and lawfully or perforce by indulgence and crime.

Many of the saloons are large enough to be used for moving pictures. Young and old of all nationalities can be interested, educated and entertained by pictures of good grade. The variety is endless; interest in them is constantly increasing. Other saloons could well be used as gymnasiums where in addition to regular athletic exercises there could be given occasionally contests of skill and endurance. Suitable prizes would lend increased interest. Other saloons should be equipped as cafeterias, where coffee and tea, sandwiches, etc., could be obtained at moderate prices. Inexpensive but good music should be provided at all these meeting-places. Lectures on popular subjects would be interesting and instructive. At the close of such lectures an open forum for questions and discussion would be found popular and well worth while.

These are but a few simple suggestions for substitutes for the saloon. Many others of equal or greater importance will readily be found if the theory of such substitution is accepted as sound and desirable and if the importance of substitutes for the saloons is realized.

In these days of social unrest and almost universal excitement, every means should be used for the moral uplift, enlightenment and stabilizing of public opinion. At such times the saloon with its vicious and powerful influence for lawlessness, degeneracy and crime is especially dangerous. To close the saloon is a tremendous reform of itself; but to make that reform permament is of equal importance. If proper substitutes are adopted and maintained the great victory will be really won. Without such reasonable and progressive action we may be doomed to bitter disappointment, and find the apparent triumph but a hollow mockery.

Whether or no such meeting-places should be organized and maintained on the club theory may be open to discussion. The best method could be determined by trial. It would be important, however, that every one should be made welcome and made to feel that he or she is needed to make the plan a success. Cordiality and sympathy, assistance to obtain employment, free nursing and doctor's attendance, all these evidences of true brotherhood are fundamental to the success of such a reform movement. They would not be found lacking. For these are the days of social service; and here would be found endless opportunity for displaying that true spirit of helpfulness, that earnest desire to "bear one another's burdens," which is the essence of the Master's teaching and which the experience of the ages has proved to be the crown of a happy and worthy life.

Keep the Old Signs

MEET the men on their level. Rent the saloons, buy their fixtures, substitute soft drinks and eatables to be served over the same bar they now serve liquors. Let the sign "saloon" stay over the door and on the windows; utilize the present bartenders, and keep them in positions. Under proper management I think they would be made profitable.

The Christian Herald Famine Fund Now Passe
$50,000 Mark—A Missionary Tells of the Urgent

OUR readers are responding generously to the need of famine-stricken India. This week we are sending the fourth remittance from their contributions to the Christian Herald Famine Relief Committee, in Bombay, of $20,000, making the total remittances to date $50,000.

Rev. R. A. Hume of Ahmednagar, chairman of the Christian Herald Indian Famine Relief Committee, writes under date of March 28:

"April, May and June are sure to be the very worst months for this famine, assuming that rain will begin to fall normally in the latter part of June. Government is opening new local relief works in all of the most distressed sections of the country. Many thousands are flocking to these governmental relief works because their own resources are exhausted. On these works just enough money is given, daily or twice a week, to keep body and soul together, but not more.

"One duty of the missionaries is to encourage people to go on to the relief works before they become too emaciated and weak to do some work by which to live. On this policy, missionaries give enough money or grain to enable starving people to get to those works. In the last few days I have personally helped 197 persons of five castes to get to governmental relief works. Not one of the 197 has returned, which indicates that all got to the works and are staying there.

"Another important kind of missionary relief is to carry on some minor relief work for people who for one reason or another cannot go on to government works. I give my own present efforts as an illustration. The two greatest physical deficiencies of life in India are: (1) Lack of enough food; (2) lack of proper housing. A very, very large part of the huge population of this country lives in small one-room houses, with inadequate ventilation and light. I have built churches, school houses, factories, wells in former times, but now I desire most of all to do at least a little to provide better housing. The new governor of Bombay is putting this need to the front in his program.

"Lately I received a legacy of $2,000 from Mrs. Lucy Palmer of Cheshire, Conn. In her will she wisely left the use of this legacy to my discretion, but indicated her preference that it should be used for some building for the training of the young. Immediately I started to build a row of well-ventilated four-room houses for Christia men and their families. This relief work, on which some d

Relation to God: Reverence and Public Worship in Endeavor, B. Y. P. U. and rth League Topic. Psalm 33:1-11, John 4:19-26.

HERE is a little plant called 'reverence' in a corner of my soul's garden which I like to have ed once a week," wrote Oliver lell Holmes. Reverence is the lation stone of a stable life. Irreve takes froth for substance and rds worth for an illusive promise. evism is a species of irreverence. hat is not to be revered. But ence is due to those powers and s which man has proven and sure. We revere the names of ington and Lincoln, we regard things they used and the places h knew their presence. We hold nd as sacred their thoughts and ssions. But they were men like elves. How much more should we d the things of God and give rev- heed to his presence and his will! roughout the generations of men spirit and power of God has given ning to life and leading to eternity. have found God good, a refuge listress, a comfort in sorrow, a gth in conflict, and men have worshiped him and have erected for united worship temples in which to call upon his name and to declare his love for mankind. We owe it to ourselves, we owe it to those whose faith we share, to participate reverently in the services through which our common worship is expressed. The minister and the choir are our leaders in worship. The hymns are worship in song, the Scripture readings are God's messages to us for the day, the minister's prayer is a leading for our own devotions; if we sit listening we may find it faulty; if we pray too, it will bring benediction to our souls. The offering is worship, it is our opportunity to give as God has prospered us. And the sermon is worship. The minister wrote it, planned it, delivers it, but only as the leader of our worhip. If we merely sit as hearers it may lack eloquence, but if we seek to find God's message through his messenger the sermon will be a light to drive away our darkness, a guide to lead us nearer to our Lord.

Youth is light and free and tends to irreverence, but we only really know the value of life when we learn to revere the worth-while things, to guard the sacred things, to make our own all that the centuries have piled up of good and of the knowledge of God, and to live before the world the good we know.

Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen has put into its hands the thriftiest writing tool ever produced.

It saves time by eliminating the constant interruptions of dipping. It lasts for years. The nibs do not have to be replaced every little while because of corrosion or loss of temper.

It puts an end to the extravagance of an ink well in which over half the ink is frequently wasted through evaporation or by becoming thick with dust. This one saving alone pays for a Waterman's Ideal over and over again.

The ever readiness of Waterman's Ideal makes for greater efficiency in the individual, enabling him or her to do more and better work.

Firms or Corporations that equip their clerical force with Waterman's Ideals solve a problem of efficiency and economy in office detail.

Boys' Club Cares for Weaker Br

THERE is a little club of boys in Detroit who have organized themselves for the purpose of looking out for unfortunate orphans, and any one who dares call boys "selfish little animals" will do well to look into the doings of this enthusiastic band.

The idea had its inception in the brain of Mrs. Della H. Bather, member of the Child Welfare League in affiliation with the Detroit Federation of Women's Clubs. When Mrs. E. S. Leonard, of the same League, in her investigations among the lowly, discovered a pitiful little fellow in a most deplorable condition, the hearts of the clubwomen were touched. Apparently the child was deaf and dumb; he was ill fed and ragged and bore the marks of cruel treatment and utter neglect. It was the coldest day in January, yet he wore neither shoes nor stockings. He was living with the most inhuman pair of step-parents out of captivity, and all that could be learned of the boy's history was that his father had brought him here from Poland shortly after his mother's death. After marrying again, the father died and the stepmother remarried. The boy was unwelcome in the new family and lived a life of torment and misery until the League came to his rescue.

Mrs. Leonard immediately set about clothing the child and took him to a specialist. Examination proved that his hearing and speech were normal but that he had been whipped into silence by his step-parents. He had grown sullen and stupid, a cautious instinct having warned him of the only way to save himself. He had not even been given a name, so his benefactors called him John.

THE Federation adopted the boy and placed him on a farm, but with the advent of war the Federation treasury had about exhausted itself complying with the various demands made upon it, so little John's board was becoming a serious problem. Then Mrs. Bather came to the rescue with a unique idea. She sat down to luncheon with her thirteen-year-old son Lester, and began to tell him about this boy John and of how the League had no money with which to pay his expenses. Did you ever know a boy who couldn't rise to the occasion?

"Don't you worry about it, Mother," announced Lester; "I'll see what I can do about it."

So he went out and rounded up all his companions, and not one of them failed him. One boy could make nice wastebaskets, and he offered to earn enough to pay John's board for one week from the sale of his handiwork. Another offered his entire allowance of ten cents a week which his father paid him. One enterprising little fellow, with no definite job from which to draw funds, decided to capitalize what resources he had and announced that he'd "take any kid—or girl, either—a long ride in his Irish Mail for two cents a passenger."

All sorts of opportunities for earning money occurred to these earnest boys with a mission. Nobody could laugh now at the other fellow when he donned a kitchen apron and washed dishes for his mother when the means were justified by such an important end—the earning of dues for the John Burkhardt Club. For that was what the boys now called themselves, and to add dignity to their undertaking and to hold their interest, Mrs. Bather called the group together and had them elect officers, procure badges and enjoy all the trappings and ceremony of a real grown-up club. The boy who does handwork presented them with a gavel, and even though it was initiated by smashing a left-over torpedo, it destroyed none of the essence of the occasion, and only went to show that the members hadn't ceased to be real boys for all their unselfish resolutions.

In order that their obligations might not become irksome, it was decided to make the dues ten cents per month, the money to be earned by the boy himself. Mrs. Bather is depending upon the formation of more Boy Clubs th Gladly will we do so, recognizing with leaping hearts that we are living in a new age of faith, when once more all things are possible to him that believeth!

In Moffatt's Translation, Hebrews 11:1 becomes the very best definition of faith in the English tongue: "Now faith means we are confident of what we hope for, convinced of what we do not see." Faith is no dreamy well-wishing, no soft and foolish optimism about existing conditions. It does not blink difficulties and pretend that all is well either. But at bottom it is a mighty conviction of the soul that since God is God and we are his, the best thoughts of human minds are not too good to be made true, but are already on their way to fulfilment.

The Essential Faith: Faith in Christ

It is in Christ that faith finds its supreme motive and at the same time its highest justification. Christ is real; his story is known; the record of the outcome of his faith and teaching accessible. Once plainly heard or intelligently read, his Gospel lays hold on the soul of man with a moral appeal that must be accepted with vital faith or ignored because of fundamental unbelief. It is the mightiest challenge to faith humanity has ever received. If accepted and followed out, as it has been by an innumerable multitude, it reveals possibilities in life unexpected by even the most venturesome of faiths. Yet it begins with the very simplest propositions: just a relationship between the soul and God of complete trust and confident understanding, just "your Heavenly Father knoweth."

To Jesus, religion means just a sense of contact with a loving Creator, a trust that sets us free of fear and anxiety. Just "have faith in God." Jesus himself had that faith and manifested it in his daily living as well as in the great crisis of his experience, so that to us Christian faith means faith like his. It means also that we have the inspiration of his own loving personality transfiguring our minds and hearts until we are changed more nearly to his likeness. It means faith that will stand the most frightful shocks from the horrors of human wickedness, like the invasion of the Prussians in Belgium or the slaughter of the Armenians by the Turks, or the bitterest of personal reverses, like his own betrayal and death on the cross. His own treatment was the worst case of injustice on record, yet he triumphed more gloriously there than in the early days of popularity. Once more we renew the confident faith of Isaiah: "He shall not fail nor be discouraged till he have set justice in the earth."

The Rewards of Faith

True faith is always rewarded. The first great reward is the joy of the faith itself, the experience of walking in the light of the Unseen Glory. Abraham's immediate reward was the peace of God in his heart. You can bring that right down to date with the Christian men who went to France to fight for humanity with sublime faith in the justice and triumph of their cause.

When you believe Christ, trust God and follow on, there can be no debate as to the fact that it is worth while. "The sweetest flower that blooms on earth is the flower of conscious duty done." And in that sense faith is a duty—notice Christ's startling way of putting it in the imperative mood: "Have faith in God!"

As to the actual outcome of faith, we know that these heroes of faith made human life as good as it is today. They won out. The future belongs always to the men who can see it. What they are confident of comes to pass, soon or late. Christ assures us that it is always so: "Fear not, little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom." Heroes of faith receive a hundredfold in spiritual verities in this world and in the world to come.

The Cost of Building Bodies

Protein is the body-builder. Also the costliest element in food.

Quaker Oats yield 16.7 per cent protein, which is more than sirloin steak. Potatoes yield less than 2 per cent—bread about 9 per cent.

That's one reason why oats dominate as food for growing children. They excel all other grains in this body-building element.

Figuring protein alone, this is what it costs at this writing in some necessary foods:

Cost of Protein
Per Pound

In Quaker Oats	$ .63
In White Bread	1.30
In Potatoes	1.48
In Beef, about	2.00
In Ham	3.63
In Eggs	2.32

Thus body-building with Quaker Oats costs half what it costs with bread, and a fraction of the cost with meat.

What Energy Costs

Energy value is another food essential. Most of our food consumption goes to supply it.

Quaker Oats yield twice the energy of round steak, six times as much as potatoes, and 1½ times bread.

At present writing energy costs in essential foods as follows:

Cost of Energy
Per 1000 Calories

In Quaker Oats	$ .05
In Round Steak	.41
In Veal Cutlets	.57
In Average Fish	.60
In Chipped Beef	.75
In Hubbard Squash	.75

Thus meat and fish foods average ten times Quaker Oats cost for the same energy value.

This doesn't suggest an exclusive oat diet. Other foods are necessary. But this food of foods—the greatest food that grows—should form your basic breakfast.

It means supreme nutrition, and the saving will average up your costlier foods for dinner.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT FOR ALL DENOMINATIONS

Primer of Christian Unity

Answers to vital questions that are stirring the Church of Christ

By H. K. CARROLL, LL.D.

A Small Pocket Volume, 64 Pages, Large, Clear Type

ONLY 10c A COPY POST-PAID

CHURCH Unity has become a theme of nation-wide discussion. Not only among the preachers themselves, from bishops and denominational leaders down to the humblest helper, but among the occupants of the pews, it is a constant topic. Even "the man in the street" is giving it thoughtful consideration.

It has been urged upon the Christian Herald to issue a booklet showing what Christian Unity is, why it is needed and what it would accomplish, and giving its history and vicissitudes from the beginning. It is written from an undenominational standpoint and gives impartial and accurate information on all phases of the subject not only for members of all the denominations, but for the general reader even outside of church circles, in order that all may have a clear comprehension of this great question which many do not now sufficiently understand. The writer, Rev. H. K. Carroll, LL.D., well known alike to both preachers and laymen, has consulted a number of the foremost advocates of Unity in the denominations, and the result is "A Primer of Christian Unity," a small pocket volume of about sixty-four pages, which covers the entire history of Church Unity, and discusses all phases of the subject, past and present. This Primer, which is a compact yet comprehensive catechism, is now ready for publication. It will be sold practically at cost of production, the object being to give it the widest possible circulation.

A Few of the 100 Questions in the Primer

What is Christian Unity?
By whom was it first proclaimed?
When did the Church cease to manifest it?
What were the causes of the first division in the Christian Church?
Was there real Christian Unity in the first thousand years?
When did the greatest division occur?
Did the Reformation re-establish Christian Unity?
What were the chief Protestant divisions?
What were the causes of these divisions?
Are these divisions an unmitigated evil?

The Soldier and His Fa

A Little Sermon Preached to the American Tro at Marseilles

By CHAPLAIN GEORGE W. RIDOUT

I SHALL endeavor to interpret the thought or truth of this scripture (Matt. 7 : 24) by giving it a bit of battle experience as a background.

You will remember the third Battle of the Marne, otherwise known as the Battle of Château-Thierry, broke out Sunday night, July 14, 1918. I was with the Thirty-eighth Regiment, which because of its brilliant action in that battle has become known as the Rock of the Marne. The regiment held a position in the Surmelin Valley and Hill between St. Eugene and Crezancy, not far from Château-Thierry. The second battalion, which bore the brunt of the fighting, was down by the river and the railroad—the third battalion, a portion of it in the valley, and Companies L and M on the hill. At midnight on that famous Sunday night, the German offensive broke upon us with a bombardment that in violence as long as it lasted was fully equal to Verdun. For ten hours bombardment and barrage kept up, but it failed to destroy the American spirit, and when at daybreak the enemy attempted to cross the Marne he was met by a hot reception by the Americans and in a very little while the river was crowded with sinking boats and wounded, drowning Germans. Platoon after platoon of soldiers of the U. S A. 38th in their defensive was almost exterminated, but the lines held. The regiment had its right flank exposed through the withdrawal of the 125th French; it had its left flank exposed because of the retreat of the troops there, and thus it had to fire in three different directions; but it held its ground! I was in the P. C. up the hill 5 o'clock Monday morning when word came that the enemy was crossing the river and coming up the hill. What did the Commander say? This is what he said: "We are here to hold the hill at all costs!"

And they held the hill. Down by the Marne River, down by the railroad, up the hill where some of the enemy had broken through they were met by the Americans, who said as did Joffre at Verdun; "They shall not pass!"

The Germans had it planned to push through to Montreuil by Monday night and to be in Paris by Wednesday night, but the Americans held them. For fifteen hours the Thirty-eighth Regiment held the lines. Wave upon wave of Huns broke upon this "Rock of the Marne." General Pershing in his report on this battle said: "One single regiment (the Thirty-eighth of the Third Division) wrote one of the most brilliant pages in military history . . . and threw two German divisions into confusion."

I believe it is purposed to erect a monument called the "Rock of the Marne" in one of the northern New York cities in honor of the men who gave up their lives in this great battle and in testimony of the gallant fight they put up.

The Rock of the Marne! Splendid! but let me speak to you of another Rock—the Rock of Ages. We sing about it:

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee!
Let the water and the blood,
From thy wounded side which flowed,
Be of sin the double cure;
Save from wrath and make me pure."

Let me speak first about building upon this Rock of Ages as the foundation for our faith.

I think one of the saddest losses a man can sustain is to lose his faith. The greatest calamity that could happen a soldier would be the loss of his faith, and to have to say to mother or father, to wife or sister or sweetheart or his preacher when he gets home: "Well, I no longer have any faith in God, the Bible, Christ or religion."

I have heard it said that after the war soldiers will be wanting a new gospel; they will have no tin old-time religion. Now I am from my experiences at the f

ayman Points Out the New Opportunity of the Church

AY a layman be permitted to ex- press his views on the Church the war? If the Church is to and have any influence, and be of benefit to this sin-cursed, bleeding struggling world, it needs reconstruc- —politically, socially, and above all itually. It must come back to the old-fashioned religion and funda- al doctrine of Love to God above hings, and love to your fellowmen. aristocratic lordship and formalistic arianism must be banished from the rch in order to redeem itself. It is et, based on historical evidence, that Church is in a large measure to e and responsible for the terrible war. The very fact that practically all the so-called Christian nations were involved in the gigantic struggle is an awful indictment, not against pure and undefiled Christianity, but against the system of the nominal Church, as practiced in the past and even at the present time. In the past, a good many fair-minded, sound-thinking people have not been able to harmonize a good many things practiced and preached by the Church with the Bible. This crisis, however, has opened their eyes and set people to thinking as never before. Will the Church heed the warning, arise to its opportunity and purge and redeem itself, or shall it fail?

A Dakota Pastor's View on Unity

ALLOW me to tell you how I learn to appreciate your Christian Herald more and more. Some of the recent contributions were doubly fine. Of course we can't always agree on minor points. I have carefully gone over the exchange of thought on the topic: "What the Church will be and do and ought to do after the war." I have enjoyed the expressions of different views. I think many go to extremes, though. Wherever the Church has been fairly doing her duty before the war, she will not be able to change much after the war. And wherever the Church has been catering to the friendship of men, more than to the true friendship of our Lord and King of the Church, Jesus Christ, there, I fear, the Modern and New Theology thought and methods will tend to break down real religion. For the principles of Bible religion can't change, any more than God himself can change. His views laid down in Scripture remain. God and his Word are one. And the Old and New Testament are one. And the way of salvation is unchangeable.

Let us be broad-minded. Let us have the vision. Let us reach out to God's children in all churches. Let us unite that which is bound together by the Holy Spirit. Let us be far from worldliness, from the "Secret Empire." Let us go out in the spirit of the Master, who mingled with the masses and loved all those who would love the Father.

But never sacrifice the principles for which our fathers in the churches of old have suffered and died!

A World Revival Movement

FROM a Christian source in Norway there has been sent out an earnest appeal to all Christian people to join in a general free-will effort to bring about a Christian Revival of the World. And we believe that now is a very favorable opportunity for such an effort. We live in a time of great world-movements. Now we have had the great war of the world—now they are working for the world peace, and the evil forces of darkness are at work trying to kindle a wicked revolution of the world. And why should not we as Christian people awake to a more eager and earnest effort to bring about a Christian Revival of the World? Therefore, in the name of the great Master Jesus Christ, let us all be up and doing what we can for this cause: The whole World for Christ, and Christ for the whole World! Let this be a special topic for our prayer meetings as well as for our Christian discourses and our testimonies and our preaching. Let us pray for it in public as well as in private, and work for it, every one in his corner of the world! Jesus Christ himself must be the leader in this movement. Without him we can do nothing. Let us remember that we must have Christ dwelling in us if we shall be his children and be able to do anything for his cause. Let this be our motto: Christ in us—and the world for Christ! This movement must embrace all denominations, all people. And God grant that the Christian press all over the world may take the matter up and work for it!

Questions and Answers

J. B. R., Davenport, Iowa. The development of man's spiritual knowledge is constant and progressive. With every successive age we attain to a clearer vision of God and a better knowledge of the divine character and purpose. Old superstitions die and the bonds in which they once held men drop away. Paganism is passing, and its ancient terrors have become well-nigh powerless. In the larger comprehension of the scheme of things to which the world is tending, we see everywhere evidences of the pervading influence of the Gospel drawing men to a higher plane of living in which their souls and bodies will enjoy greater freedom and a fuller happiness, giving to existence a loving and joyous motive.

Inquirer, Minnesota. At what hour, Oriental time, did the world war end? Also what hour, American time? I enclose a clipping from the St. Paul Dispatch.

The item enclosed by our correspondent reads as follows: "Rev. N. C. Hansen of Deer Park, Wis., has made a discovery which, if it does not have any other significance, describes the result of the war and its probable causes. Mr. Hansen observed that the war came to an end on the eleventh hour of the eleventh day of the eleventh month, and while meditating on this strange coincidence thought he would apply it to the Bible. Consequently, he turned to the eleventh book (First Kings) then to the eleventh verse of the eleventh chapter, which reads: 'Wherefore the Lord said unto Solomon, forasmuch as this is done of thee, and thou hast not kept my covenant and statutes, which I commanded thee, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee and give it to thy servant.' Substituting 'Kaiser' for 'Solomon, the verse contains food for thought."

The armistice stopped the fighting at 11 A. M., Paris time, on the eleventh of last November. This is 6 A.M. in New York City or 5 A.M. at St. Paul. The reference discovered by the Rev. Mr. Hansen is probably more of a coincidence than a prophecy.

Over thirty-three thousand men have been enrolled in the last twelve years in the Bowery Mission Brotherhood, every member being pledged, with God's help, to lead an upright, clean and useful life. The number of converts steadily increases. The Mission is supported by voluntary contributions, and is one of the best agencies for human reformation ever devised. It has a Free Labor Bureau, a Winners' Club, and other auxiliary branches. We know of no more deserving institution anywhere.

Miss M. K., Chicago. I would like to know something of Siberia, especially the climate.

Siberia extends from the Ural Mountains to Bering Strait, that is, across the whole northern part of Asia. Its population in 1908 was given as 7,049,200. It does not include all of Russian Asia, as some countries, known as the Caucasian Territories and Russian Central Asia, are considered a part of Russia proper. Its area is about 4,800,000 square miles. Nearly the whole of Siberia as far east as the River Lena is a vast low plain. East of that river it is more mountainous. The peninsula of Kamchatka is volcanic. Several of the rivers (the Ob, Yenesei, Lena and Amur) have a length of more than 2,500 miles. Lake Baikal, sixty times the size of Lake Geneva, has a depth of 5,618 feet—the deepest lake in the world. The climate is one of extreme winter cold and summer heat, the thermometer having marked as low as 90 degrees below zero. In the region about Yakutsk the soil is permanently frozen a few feet below the surface, and the ground contains large layers of permanent ice, supposed to have been deposited during the glacial period. In some parts there is so little precipitation that there is hardly snow enough for sleighing. The northern coast is bordered by an immense frozen swamp. South of this is one of the largest forest land belts in the world. In 1908 there were said to be 8,800,000 acres under cultivation. The crops were hay, wheat, oats, rye, and potatoes. The available farm land is much more than this. Over two-thirds of the population are Russian colonists. The remainder are Tartar and Mongolian tribes. Siberia has the longest continuous railroad in the world, the Transsiberian, running to Vladivostok, a distance of 4,500 miles.

I. C., New Jersey. 1. No, Germany is not directly mentioned in the Bible. 2. Many of the Gentile world were waiting for Christ. He had sheep not only in the Jewish Church, but throughout the world. They will recognize the voice of their Shepherd (John 10 : 16), and he will know his own sheep. He regards them as his own even now. They are not shunning the light and seeking darkness. The language used by the Master here seems to suggest that these other sheep have been comparatively shelterless in the past, not drawn together by any shepherd's care, but scattered abroad.

B. R. C., Sand Fork, W. Va. There is no passage in Scripture that asserts explicitly that a person goes directly to heaven after death, but there are passages from which the inference is made. Thus, we have the assurance of Christ to the dying thief on the cross (Luke 23 : 43). The parable of Dives and Lazarus is another instance. Then the passage in Philippians 1 : 23, in which Paul says he desires to depart and "be with Christ." From these passages and others, the deduction is made that there is no interval between death and the eternal state.

V. D., Salisbury, Ill. The "lost tribes" so-called were the Jews carried into captivity by Shalmaneser (II Kings 17 : 6), and chiefly belonged to Israel, or the "ten tribes." Many theories as to their location and their descendants have been adduced, and they have been claimed to have been located in Hindustan, Tartray, China, Africa, Great Britain, and among the aborigines of North America. More reasonable conjectures hold that while some returned after the exile and others were left in Samaria, many remained in Assyria and afterward joined with the Jews in forming colonies throughout the East, so that in a certain sense they shared the ultimate history of their brethren of Judah.

A. P. B., Contoocook, N. H. There is no special significance in the fact that Lot's wife was turned into a pillar of salt. Several commentators hold that the geological character of the rocks and the prevalence of salt crystals in the territory where the scene of the story is laid justify the conclusion that the Bible passage might be interpreted to mean "like a pillar of salt" and that the body of Lot's wife had become fixed for a time to the soil by saline or bituminous incrustations.

W. P. L., Mulvane, W. Va. At the beginning of the war the world's merchant ships represented a tonnage of 41,225,000 gross tons. The Allies and neutrals lost during the war 15,218,000 gross tons and built over 11,000,000, while they seized enemy ships of more than 2,250,000 tons, giving them a total of new ships of 14,249,000 tons, or a net loss of 969,000 gross tons. Of the Allied losses over 7,000,000 tons were British ships. The Germans lost 3,016,000 gross tons and were able to build and seize but 740,000, leaving them poorer in ships by 2,276,000 gross tons. The total shipping of the world on the date of the signing of the armistice was 37,000,000 gross tons, a net loss by all countries of 4,225,000 tons, borne mostly by our former enemies. But if the war had not occurred the ocean carrying fleets of the world would have increased through the normal building of new ships during the 52 months of the war by 12,000,000 gross tons, so that the real net loss by the war is 16,225,000 tons. The war-building program of all Allied and neutral shipyards is being continued, except for America's wooden ships, and the deficiency in shipping will be rapidly relieved, now that the submarines are under arrest.

Wm. H. Winton, Rochester, N. Y., sends this incident: "It is related that, hearing the sad cry 'Lost! Lost!' from a drowning man amid turbulent waters, the heart of Rev. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman was touched. He then and there resolved to devote the balance of his life to evangelistic work, and help 'rescue the perishing.' He traveled the world over in search of the lost ones in sin and brought many into the ways of everlasting peace. Will any one forget his calm, impressive face?"

Reader, Castile, N. Y. The expression you mention was used by Mr. Roosevelt in a speech at the National Convention of the Progressive Party in Chicago in 1912. He said: "We stand at Armageddon, and we battle for the Lord." Later, the name was applied to the great World War. The word occurs just once in the Bible, in Rev. 16 : 16, where it is applied to the great final world-struggle between good and evil.

F. A. D., Hurleyville, N. Y., writes: "While in New York I observed the steady flow of humanity, scarcely any one apparently interested in any one else, and the thought came to me, how hard it is for the human mind to realize how God could love each one of all those

There is an old tradition in the church when Peter found he was to be crucified asked to be placed head downward.
Bible does not state definitely that the great battle will be fought in a nation w there are no walled cities. The reference the place of the battle indicate a valley plain between high mountains. There also prophetic references to the destructio walled cities in that "day of the Lord" w evil is to be finally vanquished. See E used two symbols, the patch on an old ment, the wine in old bottles, to teach truth that the old ceremonials of Jewish ship, which foretold the coming Saviour the world, would have no place in the relig based upon fulfilment. 2. Jesus meant under the new economy of grace, the humb

Christian may accomplish more for the Ki dom of God than could John the Baptist, all his remarkable ability as a preacher of pentance. John, who lived under the old pensation, had the Christian's hope only a promise.

Mrs. H. D., Chilo, Ohio. The Bible s that if you have sinned unto death, the Sp will no longer strive with you. You will left complacent and indifferent in the mi of your sin. If you are worried over this pardonable sin," it is evident that the Sp is still striving with you. It is thought earnest students that this sin unto death wh will not be pardoned is imputing the works the Holy Spirit to Satanic agency. The Pha sees declared that Jesus cast out devils by power of Beelzebub, prince of devils.

Here's the Story—

The above illustration was suggested by a well known business man who was standing on the curb at the foot of a sharp incline leading to a bridge spanning a river.

The scene made such an impression upon him that he described it to us in detail and urged us to picture it in an ad so that all motorists might learn the lesson he got from it—"to always put on Weed Tire Chains when the roads are wet and slippery."

"The bridge had just swung closed and the policeman had given the 'Go' signal. All the motor cars, motor trucks and wagons, a long line of them, started ahead, but right in front of me stood a big car—a beauty—which seemed to me to have as much power as a locomotive, but she didn't move a foot. Stood like she was anchored, and I judged the 'clutch was slipping' until I realized that all this time the rear wheels were 'spinning' on the cobble stones like a windmill.

"It surprised me to see a small-power delivery truck with a heavy load turn out and go by the big car and up the grade without any trouble. Then I noticed that the cars that were moving were equipped with Weed Chains while the big car had nothing but slippery, bare tires.

"Here was the driver of the big car, with all its tremendous power, standing still, wasting time and wearing out his tires spinning on a rough, uneven road. And when I thought of what those big 36x5 tires cost and how they were being ruined, it taught me a lesson I will never forget.

"In the past few years I have read over and over again how Weed Chains gave positive traction and prevented slipping and skidding, but I never saw it so vividly portrayed.

"If every motorist could see it in the same way, not a single one would attempt to drive on slippery streets or pavements without Weed Tire Chains."

We are glad to put our friend's story into print and hope the lesson will "strike home" to a lot of drivers who have been either careless or indifferent about using Weed Chains—one of the most important factors in sane motoring.

The ill-fated C-5 which voyaged alone into oblivion

She was then off her se between station ships 17 and 18, about 200 west of Corvo and was asking for compass sig-

All day Saturday and Sunday destroyers and eships sailing in constantly widening spirals, hed the sea for the NC-3 and Commander Towers, eader of the flight. As we went to press there was nor, on May 19, that the cruiser Columbia had d the NC-3 and rescued her crew, and the NC-1 what damaged by rough seas was being towed to . The NC-4 was expected to complete the flight, g to Ponta Delgada on Monday, May 19, and from , after refueling, to Lisbon.

e Britishers, who had been waiting on the her at St. John's, N. F., for six weeks, encouraged e American success on the long leg of their course, led on May 18 to beat the Yanks to England. y Hawker and Mackenzie Grieve took the air eir Sopwith biplane at 1.51 P.M., New York , and headed for Ireland, 1950 miles away across sea. Their machine is capable of making 106 s an hour. The other British team Raynham and gan, tried to follow in their Martinsyde biplane, their heavy machine was wrecked by a combina- of rough ground and cross winds. Hawker and e, to lighten their craft, dropped their landing wheels. Their plane, a land plane, was therefore not equipped for alighting on either land or water, They therefore took a doubly dangerous chance, drowning if they fell into the sea and are not soon found, and crashing if they light too quickly on land. Their course was north of the steamer lanes and their chances of rescue from the sea were problematical, but not many. An unconfirmed despatch on May 19, reported the Sopwith sighted 500 miles off the Irish coast at 3 P. M.

"LET'S go!" With this simple sentence, destined perhaps to live long in American Naval circles, Commander John H. Towers, waving his hand from his flagship the NC-3 at 6 P. M., New York time, on May 16, set the three big flying boats of his aerial squadron off on the big hop to the Azores from Trepassey Bay, N. F., 1200 miles across the wide Atlantic. Facing into a west wind the big machines rose quickly, and, turning eastward with the wind at their backs, in a few minutes were out of sight over the southeast horizon. Everything humanly possible had been done to make the flight certain of completion and to guard against serious mishap. On the fifteenth, the NC-1 and 3 had attempted to start, but a cross wind made rising from the water difficult, and they had returned just as the NC-4 dropped into the harbor after a swift flight, in two legs, from Chatham, Mass., via Halifax. Lieut. Commander P. N. L. Bellinger, commanded the NC-1, and Lieut. Commander A. C. Read the NC-4.

Twenty-one destroyers were stationed at regular intervals along the course and twenty-nine more were patroling the sea or in nearby ports. The flying boats were in constant wireless touch with at least two destroyers. Each flier was equipped with a wireless direction finder, which enabled the pilot to steer unerringly in the direction of the station ship ahead of him. As each station was passed the direction of the next was taken, and so they flew across the charted course as certainly as could any ship upon the water's surface.

At 10.05 P. M., New York time, the flying fleet passed station ship number 6, the destroyer Ward, and at 12.14, New York time, they were calling number 9, the Thatcher, stationed about 500 miles from the starting-point. They were going strong and making about 85 miles per hour.

All the inhabitants of St. Johns, who could arrive, were on the beach to bid the big fliers bon voyage. The correspondents told of a constant watch being kept by the people of the Azores in anticipation of the arrival of the planes. The harbor at Ponta Delgada was cleared of all other craft to allow ample landing space for the fliers, and supply ships waited at Corvo and Horta, nearer to Trepassey, in case one or more of the boats had to make a landing short of their destination. Arrangements were also complete at Lisbon, to which port the seaplanes were expected to continue after a day's rest at Ponta Delgada. The distance to Lisbon is 786 miles.

The three big flying boats, in number the same as the little caravels in which Columbus dared the myths and currents of the unexplored Atlantic, have inspired the suggestion that in this second Columbian voyage the first to reach harbor should be christened Santa Maria, in honor of the flagship of the first discovery.

THE WORLD AWAITS GERMANY'S DECISIO

ALTHOUGH evidences have multiplied during the week that the Germans would sign the treaty, differences developed within the delegation and also in government circles in Berlin. Three possible courses of action were understood to be under consideration: to sign, to refuse to sign, and to submit the treaty to a nationwide plebiscite which should decide. Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau left Versailles for Spa, Belgium, Saturday evening, for conference with messengers from Berlin but returned on May 19. President Ebert was quoted, on May 19, as saying Germany would never sign the peace terms which were "the products of the enemy's revengful hysteria." President Ebert had previously declared that agreement could only come from desperation. Herr Erzberger declared, "By the treaty Germany is garroted, bound hand and foot, gagged and blinded. We will have less freedom than Egypt under it." Brockdorff-Rantzau in a memorandum to the Big Four declared that "The peace terms would demand of Germany several times as many victims as did the war, and that it would produce economic paralysis in Germany and force a large part of the 15,000,000 people dependent on Germany's industrial system, to emigrate or starve. The Independent Socialists have refused to organize a cabinet or to accept a seat in Ebert's cabinet, expecting that Ebert's government will fall whether it signs the treaty or refuses.

A member of the delegation was quoted as saying, on May 17, "we will sign, despite all, because we will be hacked to pieces if we return to Berlin without signing." Meanwhile May 22 was approaching, and the world waited a bit impatiently, but without much apprehension.

It developed on March 16 that the full text of the treaty provided that the treaty should go into effect as between Germany and the Allied nations ratifying it, when three Allied nations had ratified. This would give the Allied nations ratifying an immediate commercial advantage over those withholding ratification. This clause in the treaty caused considerable discussion among Senators in Washington awaiting the opening of Congress. It was looked upon as a species of coercion which might operate to prevent adequate discussion.

The German Cardinal, Archbishop Hartmann of Cologne, was reported on May 15 to have appealed to the Pope to intervene in the Peace Congress to protect Germany from the complete breakdown threatened in the peace terms. It had been reported earlier that the Italians inserted in the secret treaty of London a paragraph expressly excluding the Pope from participation in the peace negotiations. The Pope was said to be taking the German request up with an influential delegation in Paris.

The Austrian delegation, headed by Chancellor Karl Renner, reached Paris on May 14, and was lodged at St. Germain. The Chancellor was met by French officials. Chancellor Renner was reported to be in excellent spirits, and to have declared that he hoped he might go away with as joyful a heart as he brought. Allied plans for the Peace Conference contemplate separate negotiations with the Austrian and German delegations. The German delegation asked for an opportunity to confer with the Austrians, and this was denied. The German delegation delivered to the Allies a number of notes; one of them was a complete plan for a League of Nations which provided for a world parliament, limitation of armament and freedom of the seas. The Allies were reported to have replied that the plans would not be considered. Another note declared the economic clauses of the treaty would mean the ruin of Germany if enforced, and another protested against the Saar Valley arrangement and the transfer of the Walloon districts of Rhenish Prussia to Belgium. The Germans were reported to have expressed satisfaction with the Allied plan for the repatriation of prisoners of war, and they suggested the appointment of a commission to arrange the details.

The peace terms to Austria, according to the Paris correspondents, will include the destruction of the great Skoda gun plants at Vienna and the abolition of conscription. There was a suggestion that German Austria might seek to have the treaty recognize her union with Germany, but the Austrian delegates made no effort to get into communication with the German delegates.

Although the Italian situation was reported to have reached a deadlock, Peace Conference circles were said to be hopeful for an early settlement. Meanwhile the Italians were landing large military forces at Jara and Sebenico, and fortifying the passes in the mountain ridges east of these ports. The Austrian treaty will be drawn to leave Istria and Dalmatia outside Austrian boundaries without ceding it definitely to either claimant.

One possible point of friction was removed on May 17 when Italy relinquished all claim to the Dodecanese Islands off the coast of Asia Minor. The population of the islands had been demanding annexation to Greece. The Allies on May 17 took possession of all the forts at Smyrna, foreshadowing the application of the mandatory principle to the Syrian coast. Italian troops were landed at Adalia.

The Week in the World's News

Fight Awaits the Thaws. Dispatches of May 12 indicated that the advance of the Kolchak Siberian forces on Moscow was held up by the early summer thaws, but would be resumed as soon as the ground was hard enough for the movement of heavy guns. Samara on the Volga was reported captured by Kolchak forces on May 15, and other dispatches said that the Bolshevist Government was removing its departments from Petrograd and would not defend the city. Later it was reported that a force was being conscripted to defend Petrograd. The Finnish Army, under General Mannerheim, was within 20 miles of Petrograd on May 15. The Bolshevist hold on Riga was also said to continue only because of German interference with the Lettish forces. On May 12 a clash between the British and Bolshevist flotillas on the Dvina, south of Archangel, resulted in the sinking of a Bolshevist gunboat.

Seeing Eclipse by Airplane. Professor David Todd of the Amherst College Astronomical Observatory sailed on May 13 for the western coast of Brazil. A United States Naval Airplane and crew were on board the steamship with him. There will be a total eclipse of the sun on May 29, and the professor planned to ascend in the airplane to an altitude of 10,000 to 15,000 feet in order to photograph the corona, without the interference of clouds, and with the blue rays which affect the photographic plate, and which are absorbed by the atmosphere, in fuller strength.

A Union Bank. Toledo, Ohio, on May 13, was the scene of a struggle between the unions and employers over hours of labor, the employers asking the men to work 48 hours a week, and the men insisting on 44, with slight wage increases. Because of the support given by the banks to the manufacturers, a proposition was being worked out for the establishment of a bank by the unions to which all of their savings would be transferred.

A Year of the Air Mail. On May 15 the United States Air Mail Service, between New York and Washington, completed its first year. The same planes that began the year were used for the flights on the anniversary day. During the year out of 726 flights made by military and mail aviators only 7 flights were uncompleted, and in only 7 others were stops necessary short of the destination. The service cost $142,861, and the total revenue was estimated at $161,964, or a surplus of $19,103.

For an Earlier Congress. A movement is under foot among the members of the new Congress to pass legislation providing for three sessions of each Congress instead of two as under the present law, the first session to meet March 5, immediately following the Congressional elections, and the other two sessions to meet on the first Monday in December as at present.

To Finance China. Arrangements have been made whereby American, British, French and Japanese banks will act in concert in making loans to the Chinese Government for administration and industrial purposes. Thirty American banking institutions will participate in the American share of the loan, the purpose of the concert being to enable China to develop her own resources according to a definite plan, instead of by means of concessions to foreign interests. Some of the enterprises financed by the funds to be supplied will be assisted by experts of the various governments.

Japan and Korea. The Japanese Privy Council on May 15 decided on a partial revision of the organic system of the Korean Government, substituting, as far as possible, civil for military control, giving civilians a larger share in the administration and affording greater opportunities to Koreans to participate in the government. Rev. Eli M. Mowry, American missionary in Korea, was sentenced on May 17 to serve four months in prison for sheltering Korean agitators, the sentence being suspended for two years. Mr. Mowry appealed to the highest court. His defense was that he did not know his guests were wanted by the police.

For Peace in China. The United States State Department advices of May 12 indicated that the Chinese Peace Conference at Shanghai was approaching a successful settlement of the differences between North and South China, the southern Chinese considered the present national Congress in Peking unconstitutional, while the Parliament formerly elected and dissolved before the revolution, is meeting in Canton. It was expected that a compromise would be reached under which both these Parliaments would go out of existence and a new Parliament, to include representatives from all of China, would be elected.

Our Battle Deaths. Revised figures made public on May 15 give the deaths in battle of soldiers of the American Expeditionary Force as 48,909. The total casualties, killed, wounded and missing, on 15 were for the Army 285,144, for the Marine 5,762.

Korea Asks Liberty. A Korean delegatic May 12 presented to the Peace Conference a pl the recognition of Korea as an independent stat for the nullification of the treaty of August, under which Korea became a part of the Empi Japan.

Two Nations Contend in Ocean Flight

at 11 A. M. on the 15th, after losing her way in a The trip of the "blimp" was in the nature of a flight, the distance being in the neighborhood of miles, or one-half of the distance from Newfoundl to Ireland. It was expected that the dirigible wo take part in the attempt of the NC or Nancy planes span the Atlantic in one flight, although it was gested that the "blimp" might fly direct to Irela while the Nancies were scheduled to fly to Azores.

The big "blimp" met rough weather just a anchoring at St. John's. A 30-mile gale from the w caused her to strain at her leash, and about 4 P. 100 men from the Chicago went ashore to try to h her down with man ropes. But the wind increa to 40 miles and ropes began to break. Lieuten Little, in command, ordered to the ground the cr which was overhauling the machinery, then he tempted to pull a cord which would have rele enough of the gas to reduce the size of the balloon a make her easier to hold. The cord broke, and the m having eased their hold on the ropes the big ship t away from her anchors, the Lieutenant dropp twenty-five feet to the ground, and the balloon sail away to the eastward without a crew. The destroy Edwards started in chase, and late in the evening English ship wirelessed that she had sighted the gas bag and was standing by until the Edwards co take it over and tow it back to St. John's The Engli man, however, had sighted an iceberg, and the wards after a fruitless cruise all night, returned in morning empty-handed. The "blimp" was given for lost and the attempt to cross to England dirigible was abandoned for the time being.

With the C–5 probably out of action, becaus her unscheduled flight, interest was deepened in contest for ocean priority by the announcement th the British dirigible R–34 would probably be se westward soon, and might be the first lighter-than machine to complete the crossing. The Ameri Navy was preparing to house the R–34 at Ca May.

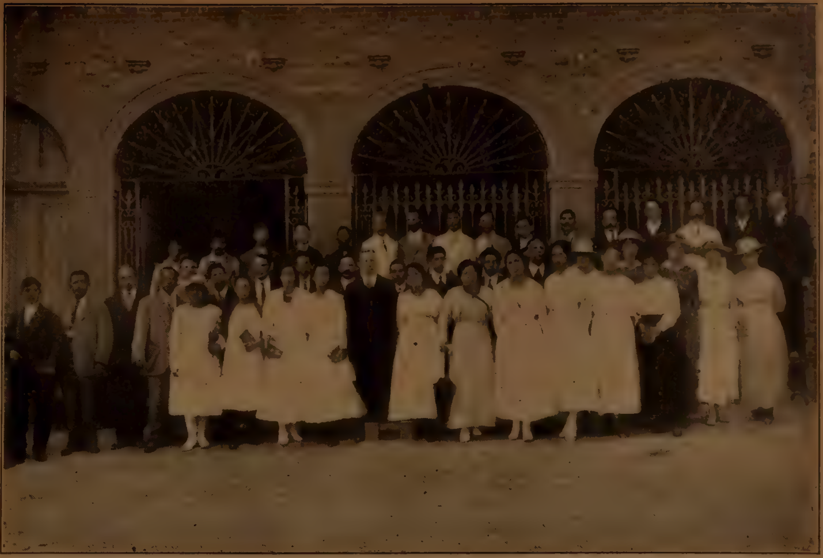
FTER THE EARTHQUAKE * * D AFTER THE FIRE * * A STILL, SMALL VOICE"



Sunday school teachers, missionaries, native pastors, Indians and Spanish evangelists at mission in Guatemala City

WE FEEL certain that the Christian Herald Family, which cabled help so promptly in the early days of the awful earthquakes which visited this city in the last days of 1917 and the beginning of 1918, will be deeply interested in seeing a picture of our reconstructed mission building, in the restoration of which they have had a vital part.

The photograph was taken on Easter Sunday at the close of a five days' Bible conference. Nearly seven hundred were present at the Sunday school on Sunday afternoon. All of the outer walls of the second story were uilt; also some of the arches in the front of the er story. The building, as it stands, is a plain cture, but much stronger than the former one in earthquake-resisting powers. The property, at a servative valuation, is worth $25,000 gold.

n the first floor we have our auditorium. The ts barely accommodate 500, so that the overcrowd- had to be taken care of in the patio and in the day school classrooms in the annex. On the second r there are eight dormitories and an office, where correspondence of the mission and the duplicat- of many Bible lessons and all clerical work are at- ded to. There is a commodious sitting-room where weekly meeting of the Sunday school teachers is d, also dental parlors where many of the Lord's r receive treatment gratis. In an annex back of main building there are eleven apartments used Sunday school classes, dormitories for native be- ers who come in from out-stations, as well as liv- -rooms for the caretaker and his family.

n connection with this working center, there are nty paid pastors, evangelists and colporteurs in a trict of about 100 by 200 miles in extent. During year these native workers reported over 500 con- sions. There are about 2,500 believers living in s territory connected with the center.

ast year, on account of the earthquakes, it was ossible to hold the annual Bible conferences, but s year we have come together again for a five days' dy. All of the native workers, excepting one far- ay Indian, were here; many came from the out- tions. The general theme was "True Spirituality." We baptized twenty-two on the last day of the conference, bringing the total up to 116 in the territory connected with this center since January 1. One of the best sessions of the conference was that in which the native workers told what God had wrought during the past year, and of their faith in Him for greater things this year.

Quiche Indians worshiping idols

A group of Quiché Indians

The city of Guatemala has a population of about 125,000. Most of those who fled at the time of the earthquake disaster have returned, and many new people have come in seeking work.

The Central American Mission and the Presbyterian Mission, working on comity lines, have made a satisfactory division of the city. In the suburbs at our end of the town we are facing a great need. In all these suburbs there are some believers. The people are poor; most of them are still living in huts and shanties, and many are not even able to furnish a coal oil lamp when cottage meetings are held in their little shacks. We believe the time has come when we should erect a plain mission hall in at least four of these suburbs. Years ago an aged couple living in Kansas gave the major part of the funds for the building of our central mission building. Untold blessing has resulted from their gift. We believe God has some faithful stewards who will be glad to contribute the funds necessary to build these four branch mission halls. The cost is estimated at $1,500 each, or $6,000 for the four. We have well-trained native workers, apt for the preaching of the Gospel in all these suburbs.

The Central American Mission was organized twenty-eight years ago by Dr. C. I. Scofield, world-famous through the Scofield Reference Bible. The missionary in charge, Mr. A. E. Bishop, was a leading business man in Abilene, Kansas, back in the eighties. In the height of business prosperity, he and his wife felt called to go as missionaries to Central America. They turned all their property into money, using it to bring a number of missionaries to Central America, and for furthering the Gospel on the field. A few months after their arrival souls were saved, and from that day to this the work has not ceased. The church of the central station is supporting three native evangelists.

We believe many of your readers will take a real interest in praying for these four branch mission halls. The congregation at the central station has more than doubled since the earthquakes; the attendance every Sunday is between 400 and 500. The branch mission halls would be the solution of numerous problems. The need is a real one. A. E. BISHOP.

The Gospel Among the Heathen Quichés

WE HAVE received your kind gift of $50, for which we thank your readers sincerely.

This country has been severely tested during the recent years, by earthquakes and volcanic eruptions, and lately by the terrible influenza epidemic, which closely followed the one of yellow fever. This mission center cared for about 40,000 people, and as they were scattered over a large territory, among the high mountains, the death rate was large, some one thousand dying, principally Indian women, who generally refused to take medicine. The scientific capacity of the republic was tested to its utmost. While there are many able medical men in Guatemala, it was quite impossible to care for all the sick, as the blow fell almost in a night, and medical supplies were soon depleted. The government cooperated in a most active manner, and its efforts for the relief of the people are worthy of all praise.

The Gospel work here among the Quiché Indians is actively prosecuted, and there are many fine believers among them, there being several interesting congregations. This is a somewhat difficult work, as it is necessary to travel many miles over the mountains to reach all these people. Some of our work takes us several days' journey from the station to reach the more savage Indians. But entrance to them has been won by means of the medicine case. We are making a special effort to reach the more remote people, and while dangers and difficulties are numerous, they are overcome by perseverance and the burning desire to fulfil the Master's last command. Among these isolated people, for whom nobody cares, numbers have accepted the truth, and literature has been eagerly welcomed by those able to read. We are distributing large quantities of Gospel literature, as well as Bibles and Testaments and portions.

I enclose photographs of Indians and Indian scenes. One is a most remarkable picture, and shows a high priest of the semi-savage Indians, far to the north, offering sacrifice of fire and flowers at daybreak. Note the hatred and indignation in the expression, while the priest is oblivious of our photographing one of their sacred mysteries. C. F. SECORD.

DAILY STRENGTH FOR DAILY NEED

TEXT—Deut. 33 : 25. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be."

IN ALL the Word of God there are few promises sweeter than this. Three things are implied in this text: that strength will be needed, that strength will be given, and that the strength thus given will be graduated according to our daily needs.

The Bible is a very plain and practical Book. It is always outspoken, and it never blinks the sterner facts of life. This outspoken honesty of the old Book is one thing that commends it so strongly to the universal human heart. In keeping with this prevailing spirit of the Bible, is the strong recognition in our text of the fact that strength will be needed to live our human lives aright. For one thing, strength will be needed for the burden of practical tasks. There has never been an age in the world's history when men and women were more driven than they are today.

I stood one morning at the end of Brooklyn Bridge, watching the working girls crossing over, in the early hours, from Brooklyn to Manhattan. Here they came, a long and, to the thoughtful eye, a somewhat pathetic procession. The cars were loaded with them. Many were walking the long distance over because they could not afford the five-cent carfare. Some of those dear children were eating their breakfasts as they hurried along. A simple sandwich in their hands, and the look of haste in their eyes, as they rushed to meet the demands of the new day! Who can look upon such a scene without being profoundly moved? Never before have business men, and women in the home, and this great army of working girls had such burdens to bear as they have today; and surely strength is needed for these imperious tasks.

Then, again, strength will be needed to meet the mysteries of suffering. Truly does the Bible say, "In this world ye have tribulation," and in one form or another, it comes to all of the children of men. In this age, there are more broken hearts and bowed forms and perplexed minds than ever before in the long sad history of sinful man upon this planet; and strength, therefore, is needed, needed imperatively if despair is not to engulf the individual and the race.

HOW cheering is the fact that this strength will be given! How blessed and comforting the truth that we have a Helper, for one thing, who knows our needs, and, for another thing, who has the power to satisfy those needs. Jesus said, "Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things" (Matt. 6 : 32). And we also are taught that God is able to "supply all your need according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4 : 19).

There is a story I want to tell you of a young woman who had been given by a friend of hers a most beautiful silk handkerchief. By accident she overturned the ink pot over it as it lay on the table, and soiled a good part of it. She wept until her heart literally ached when she thought of the gift, ruined by her own carelessness; and how she reproached herself! About that time, Ruskin came in and saw her distress, as, weeping, she held up the mutilated handkerchief, and he smilingly took it from her. Artist that he was as well as poet, he went to his study and set to work upon that blot, drawing figures upon it until he had finished the drawing, and then with a delicate brush he painted in the picture and returned the handkerchief to her. "Oh," she said, "that is not my handkerchief?" "Yes, it is yours." "Mine?" "Yes; I simply took the ugly blot and transformed it into a picture." How often God has done that, if we could only see it! He has taken our blotted life, when we have been sorely disappointed, and thought we would have to go marred and mutilated through the remainder of our days, and has handed it back with that mutilated background transformed into a picture! That is the beauty of being a Christian. That is what the blessing of Christ is, if we only realize it.

To the overwrought and nerve-wrecked business man, to the worried housewife, to the young woman driven out from the safe shelter of home to the hard conditions of modern industry, and to all who walk in the shadow of sin or the lonely way of pensive grief, our loving Father is able to and will give strength.

THE third inspiring and comforting truth of this text is that this strength, which our loving heavenly Father gives us, will be graduated according to our need. "As thy day, so shall thy strength be." So it should be, to be in keeping with the conditions of our human life. The engine generates the steam to drive it as it rushes along the shining rails. If the effort were made to put into the boiler, at the beginning of the journey, sufficient steam to send it to its distant goal, the engine would be blown into a thousand pieces. And so God deals with us on the day-by-day and the hour-after-hour plan. He sent the manna to the children of Israel fresh every morning; and his promise to us is that his blessings shall be renewed to us day by day.

Have you ever thought how merciful and good God is to us in not allowing us to know the future? If, for example, we could know the blessings that were coming to us from the future, would not the tendency be to spoil us and to make us indolent and indifferent? If each individual should receive worldly rewards in exact proportion to virtues, and if he knew that immediately and surely those rewards were coming, would it not tend to destroy all right character and all heroism of soul? There is in Rogers' "Greyson Letters" a description of a man whose conscience became so entangled with his stomach that every deception made him sick, and the least thought of untruth unsettled his stomach so that he became truthful almost by force; and he soon came, therefore, to the point where he longed to be free, so that he c know whether he really loved the truth for tr sake, and whether he was willing to make sacri in order to maintain it.

This element of uncertainty concerning the fut the casual quality which God has written into lives, is a part of our truest blessedness if we c only realize it. In that beautiful and striking st "The Garden of Allah," Domini and Androvsky permitted the heavenly delights of their honeym in the midst of the beauty of the desert, as they j ney from the charms of one oasis to another; this permitted, I say, to them, and the fulness of t happiness and joys was unmarred by knowledg the fact that, a little way farther on, would come tragic revelation which would separate them fore so far as the journey of earthly life was concer Yes, God is indeed most gracious in that he hides future from our view, and most wise in teaching that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

WHEN Rudyard Kipling visited America a years ago, he played on the deck of the stean with rare buoyancy, with his daughter Joseph Shortly after coming to New York, Josephine taken seriously ill. Soon afterward, his own ill became alarming. During its earlier stages, he quently asked, "How is Joe?" Then his own ill became so serious that, for a time, the consciou of his daughter disappeared. In his convalescenc again asked, "How is Joe? Where is she? Why d she not come to see me?" Joe had gone down i and had passed through the dark river during father's serious illness. When he asked these qu tions, she was asleep under the snow of an Ameri winter. How merciful was God that he hid th coming sorrows from father and child during th joyous days on the deck of the Atlantic steamer!

Yes, God is very merciful to us in that he draw curtain over the future. Very foolish, therefore, it to load tomorrow's burden upon that of today; a equally foolish is it to presume upon the success a the joy which shall be ours tomorrow. Avoiding b of these extremes, is not the highest philosophy of attained when we reach that point where quietly a gratefully we become willing to trust God absolut and to live out our lives one day at a time?

"Lord, for tomorrow and its needs I do not pray;
Keep me, my God, from stain of sin just for tod

Let me both diligently work and duly pray;
Let me be kind in word and deed just for today.

Let me in season, Lord, be grave, in season, gay;
Let me be faithful to thy grace just for today.

So for tomorrow and its needs, I do not pray;
But keep me, guide me, love me, Lord, just for day!"

OWN YOUR OWN HOME

The Desire To Be Independent

SOMEWHERE in the heart of every man is the desire to be independent. Independence is the measure of one's standing in the community.

The first step along the road to independence is to own one's home. The man who owns his own home is the respected, the trusted man in every community.

One of the largest employers of labor in the country ordered a canvass of his factories to determine what percentage of his employees owned their own homes. At the same time he urged all employees in the establishment to become home-owners or home-buyers.

Sound logic prompted this action. The responsible man is the valuable employee. The home owner has a deeper sense of civic pride. He is established; he is responsible; he is interested in everything that tends toward the peace and security and upbuilding of the community.

The example set by one manufacturer will be followed by others. It will daily become more requisite to a man's securing responsible employment that he own his own home.

Homes, Schools, Churches and Roads

WE WENT into the war to aid in making the world a better place in which to live. Behind the victory of arms, if the United States is to appropriate her share of the fruits of victory, must be the determination to do those things which make for prosperity and for happier and more contented people.

Homes, the very foundation of the social structure; schools, the mold in which our citizenship is cast; roads, the arteries of commerce; churches, springs of spiritual inspiration! These we need in increasing numbers throughout the land if America is to be made a better place in which to live.

War interrupted our construction work in these lines. The country needs almost a million homes right now. It needs hundreds of schools. There are not enough good roads or churches.

To resume work in these lines immediately means convincing evidence of our faith in the country's future; it means stimulation for all lines of business; and, of profound importance right at this time, it means a demand for labor—employment for the returning soldier.

"Thrift Turns Savings Into a Home"

THE American Home Owner is the man who has discovered that thrift is something more than the hoarding of money. The family "sock" and the old china teapot may be chuck full of dimes and quarters, or five and ten dollar gold pieces, and yet thrift may be unknown to the head of the house.

Thrift not only saves intelligently, but it puts savings to work; not only does it save a dollar, but it puts that dollar where it will thrive, where it can earn and labor for the welfare and comfort of its owner.

On account of suspended building operations during the war, the United States now needs almost a million homes. That means, rents are high. If you don't own a home you must pay tribute to the hard necessities which have brought about a scarcity of homes. Unless home building gets under way immediately, when our millions of soldiers return to civil life and when our thousands of war workers who have been living in government buildings get back to where they must have apartments and houses, rents are going to be higher.

Toledo Has Novel Building Plan

BARGAINS in building have been introduc in Ohio. In Toledo it is possible to obta materials of many sorts at a reduction of from to 10 per cent. All that is necessary is to bre ground and prove intention to begin constructi immediately. Then a card is issued that assur concessions.

Toledo did not start its special Own-Your-Ow Home campaign until rather late, and it was necessa to hasten action. Mayor Cornell Schreiber consente to be chairman of the campaign committee, and h selected as the twenty-four members to serve und him representatives of civic organizations, retail a wholesale merchants, lumbermen, dealers' buildin supply men, electrical workers, labor unions, an schools. Headquarters were opened, and the new papers cooperated in giving publicity to the "drive for more houses.

A fund was raised to carry on the campaign, a then the big idea was put forth. Prospective builde were notified that they could obtain cards authorizin discounts of from 5 to 10 per cent. at headquarter these cards being signed by Mayor Schreiber and b George W. Stevens, who has charge of the campaig As Mr. Stevens is director of the local Museum of Ar his aid and influence were sought especially, for T ledo, in common with other American cities, is aimin to add to the beauty and appropriateness of its archi tecture.

There is little excuse for a man not owning his o home. The great Liberty Loans have instilled in the American people lessons of thrift that will endu through the coming days of peace. Every man ca and should own his own home.

THE CHILD LABOR EVIL

deral Child Labor Law clared Unconstitutional

THE child labor section of the War Revenue Bill, placing a prohibitive tax on the products of child labor entering rstate commerce, has been de- ed unconstitutional by Federal ge James E. Boyd. Last year he lared void the original Child Labor , which the United States Supreme rt annulled by a margin of one vote. ollowing the arguments made by onents of the provision in Congress, ge Boyd said that the child labor ler" sought to accomplish the regu- on of employment by indirection in use of the taxation powers, and was invasion of the states' regulatory horit.

he revenue law levies a 10 per cent. on products of factories employing ldren under fourteen years of age, those between fourteen and sixteen rs working more than eight hours ly, when the products enter inter- te commerce.

udge Boyd made permanent a porary injunction prohibiting the orcement of the law in the case of harlotte, N. C., factory.

Two Southern states—from one of ich this jurist hails—are the worst nders in their sordid indifference the protection of childhood.

n one of these "commonwealths" ll owners may permit children un- fourteen years to work fifty-six urs weekly, but if the children have t one or both parents they may work y number of hours required.

Two Acts of Congress

ONGRESS has twice tried to put some restraint upon the cruelty of em- yers in states that are backward in lfare or humanitarian laws.

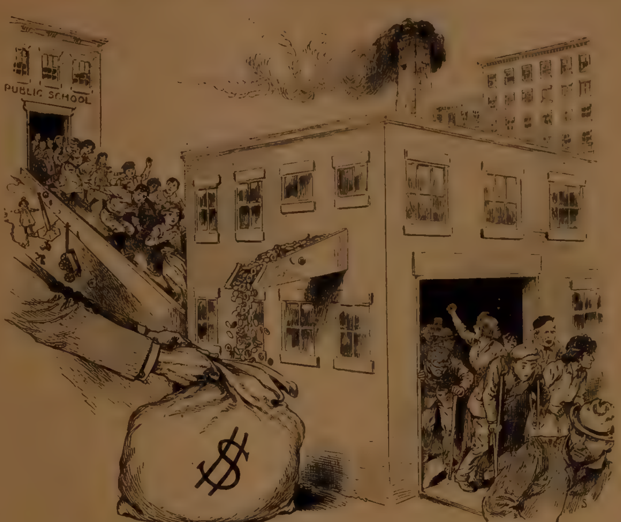
It is eminently just that such a law, en enacted, shall apply to all the states the Union, so that no special group of nufacturers or employers in any state n profit by their avarice and cruelty d thereby do a double wrong, first by ghting childhood, and, second, by ating a standard of cheap labor with ich more enlightened states would be able to compete.

For the second time within three years Federal judge has been found willing set aside a law forbidding such prac- es. The statute previously declared constitutional simply forbade the em- oyment of child labor. The Supreme urt of the United States affirmed the wer court's decree that the law inter- red with the rights of states to make bor laws.

Congress, spurred on by public opinion, omptly re-enacted the statute in a new rm, this time imposing a tax of 10 per nt. upon all products made by such ild labor.

If this second attempt of Congress to forbid child bor is declared unconstitutional, then the Constitu- on must be amended to secure results.

The Dollar Mill Grinds Childhood Into Bolshevism



Infamy of Child Labor in Factories

By CHARLES GRANT MILLER

IT IS unspeakably infamous that men should get rich from the labor of children whose bones are ground into almighty dollars.

It is an old and cruel story. It is difficult to frame laws successfully to overcome human ignorance and greed.

Child labor under harsh and unwholesome conditions is a wrong not alone against the children whose lives are thus blighted, but against society. The child naturally looks to the parent for support, and when he is forced into labor and his earnings are taken from him for family use, the impressionable child mind becomes molded to the idea that labor is unrequited and is a cruel injustice forced by wealthy employers.

There the quick seed of Bolshevism is implanted.

What the child forced into labor earns is taken from him, but by and by he may discover that what he can steal or take by force and keep to himself is his to enjoy. There can be no true conception of the right of property engendered in the child that is forced to unrequited toil.

Many a criminal in the prisons, many an incurable invalid in the hospitals, many an extremist agitator owes his pitiable state to enforced work under unwholesome conditions in childhood that sapped his life or impressed upon him a lifelong detestation of all toil.

Child labor in the factories is a wrong against all labor and against all right industrial relations.

It means decrease in the total wage.

It means less product and less perfection of it.

It is a degradation of industrial conditions, viewed from any standpoint. Not only does the quality of products necessarily deteriorate, but manhood and ideals are necessarily sacrificed by this unnatural and infamous wrong.

Statutes that will hold may be good, when we get them, but enlivenment of public opinion is far better, and we may get this now.

It is a wrong that every man who cares for the welfare of his children and every man who cares for the welfare of labor and capital, of civilization and humanity, should set his heart and hand against.

Children Not Equally Protected

THE unequal protection afforded children going to work in the different states and the unequal pportunity given them to secure an elementary lucation are emphasized in a pamphlet, entitled The States and Child Labor," which has been re- ntly published by the Children's Bureau of the nited States Department of Labor.

For instance, although forty-three states recognize their laws the principle that children should be at ast fourteen years old before they start wage-earning, ost of them fail to apply the principle to all children ithout exception. In two states the age fixed by law lower than fourteen and in three there is no mini- um age except for work in certain dangerous or in- rious occupations.

While every state in the Union names certain ages etween which children are required by law to go to chool, the pamphlet points out that the widely vary- g range of ages prevents equalization of opportunity or children in different localities. The most usual equirement for school attendance is that affecting hildren between seven and sixteen years, or between ight and sixteen years. The lowest range of ages in y state is from eight to twelve years. Two states have standards high enough to require the attendance at school of children between seven and seventeen years. In three states the laws are not state-wide, and leave to local option decision whether the state education law shall apply within the county or district.

The fact that in every state exemptions are permitted to the compulsory school attendance law is given as another reason for the great variation in the amount of schooling obtained by children in different states. These exemptions allowed under the law, it is stated, drag down in some states an apparently high standard to such a degree that less protection is afforded to the child than by a requirement in another state which appears to be less exacting but which permits no exceptions.

In seventeen states, for instance, the fact that the child has completed the grammar grades excuses him from school attendance. In one state the law specifies that a child who can read and write simple English sentences need not continue to attend school. In many states any child who has reached the age when he may legally work and is lawfully employed is excused from school. This means that, although a compulsory school-attendance law appears to demand the child's presence in school, he is actually allowed to stop his education and go to work before completing the compulsory-education period.

Fourteen states will excuse a child from school solely for "satisfactory," "sufficient" or "urgent" reasons, for "domestic necessity" or for "cause." Two of these fourteen states, however, specify that the "urgent reason" shall be "strictly construed." Under the laws of eleven states, poverty, the need to support a widowed mother or "other member of family dependent on child," excuses a child of any age from school attendance. In eight states the law specifies that children be excused because of parents' inability to provide suitable clothing, and twenty-six states specify in their laws that a child who lives two, two and a half or three miles, or more than a reasonable distance, from the nearest school need not attend. One of these states says that a child shall be excused if he "lives at such a distance as to render attendance impracticable or unsafe." This difficulty, the leaflet states, is sometimes overcome by a provision for free transportation.

Increase in Child Labor

AN INCREASE in child labor during the war is reported from every one of twenty cities visited by agents of the Children's Bureau.

In a large industrial city in Missouri there was an increase of 143 per cent. in the number of employment certificates issued to girls in 1916–17 over the number issued in 1915–16. According to the reports of the certificate office the greatest increase has come from the grammar-school graduates, an unusually large number of whom are going to work instead of to high school. In 1917–18 the same city reported the number of girls leaving school for work was smaller than in the previous year, and this decrease was attributed in part to the opening of a new trade school for girls and women.

In one New Jersey city, although the population has increased, the average daily school attendance has decreased four per cent. The children are leaving school as soon as they are legally able. The greatest decrease in enrolment was found in the seventh and eighth grades.

In a Pennsylvania manufacturing town the decrease in school enrolment came in the elementary grades. The state factory inspector explained this by the number of excuses for domestic service. The older members of the family seek employment, and the smaller girls stay at home to do the housework. In the same city the attendance at the continuation schools, which is compulsory for all working children between fourteen and sixteen years, has increased 30 per cent.

England's New Law

IN AUGUST, 1918, the English Parliament passed the new Education Bill known as the Fisher Bill. Mr. Fisher, in introducing this bill, said: "Economy is in the air. We are told to economize in our expenditures and foodstuffs. I suggest that we should economize in the human capital of the country—our most precious possession, which we have too long neglected." He later says: "We do not want to waste a single child. We desire that every child in the country should receive the form of education most adapted to fashion its qualities to the highest use."

The new English law requires that no child shall be exempted from school under fourteen years of age, or before the end of the school term in which he becomes fourteen. The local educational authorities are given power, on the report of the school medical officer, to prohibit the employment of a child in an occupation which is detrimental to the child's physical development. The law further provides that all employed children between fourteen and eighteen years of age shall attend school 320 hours per year. For the first seven years after the law takes effect the compulsion is to apply to working children between fourteen and sixteen to attend continuation schools on the employers' time. After that period of time children between sixteen and eighteen years of age will automatically come under the act. This provision of the law will insure that the influence of the school will remain in the child's life during four critical years of adolescence, and that during those four years he will be under constant medical supervision. The law protects not only the city child but also the rural child, who in this country has never enjoyed the protection of the child-labor laws.

Tell It to All the People

ADVERTISING the Church and the Gospel in the modern sense is a thing of comparatively recent date. There are still many very good people who think it wrong to advertise anything that relates to religion. Yet if these dubious ones would search their Bibles, they would find that one of the chief duties imposed upon those who love God and his salvation is to publish the good news everywhere.

This advice runs all through the Scripture. The Song of Moses declares: "I will publish the name of the Lord; ascribe ye greatness to our God." Jeremiah proclaims it the duty of the righteous to publish the goodness of God to all the people, to declare it among the nations, to set up a standard, to "publish and conceal not." Amos urges the righteous to publish in the palaces and among the peoples God's will toward transgressors. Jesus himself announces the duty of his followers to publish the Gospel among all nations; and the man restored to his right mind was ordered to return to his own people and to show how great things God had done unto him, and he published the good news throughout the whole city.

The prophets were not afraid of publicity, neither were the disciples who obeyed the Saviour's injunction to "Let their light shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

Our churches today have the best of precedents for giving the Gospel all the publicity they can command. Especially has this become a duty in these days of world reconstruction. It is not only to the heathen in foreign lands that we need to bring the Word, but to the unreached and neglected masses at home, who are strangers in God's house. They must be shown that it has a cordial welcome ready for them and that they are entitled to a share in its ministrations and to the friendly fellowship of its members. It is our duty to win them over, by every means in our power, to come into the life of the Church and have an active part in its service and a share in its blessings. Those who neglect this duty take the narrow view. The Church of God is not a close corporation, a select society, a little group set apart and enjoying special spiritual privileges which may not be shared with the multitude. In God's sight all of us are his children, and his house is the one place where all should meet on the same level of Christian equality.

We are glad to note that some of the churches which have hitherto been among the most exclusive are discarding the old system of pew-renting and throwing the gates of God's house open, with a wide welcome and free seats for all. We should like to see this custom adopted in all the Christian churches. There is no monopoly in God's blessing, and there should be no monopoly of privileges in worship. Jesus taught the law of love and kindness, and we should exemplify our obedience by our church hospitality. All doors should stand open that lead to Jesus.

When you go to church next Sunday try to bring with you some one who has been a stranger to the Lord's house, and get your friends to do likewise. The invitation to worship is not to you and yours only and to other regular attendants; it is to all the people, for all alike have a debt of gratitude to pay, a prayer for help to offer, or a song of joy to raise. You may not be able to publish the Gospel throughout the nation but you can at least do so within your own circle.

As for the churches themselves, their sphere of publishing the work takes a larger range. The press has made many men millionaires; if used as an adjunct for the spread of the Gospel it could increase manyfold the spiritual riches of the churches.

Housing the Homeless

IN NEW YORK and other cities of large population the housing problem has become an acute one. In the metropolis itself this situation has given an opportunity to the churches to illustrate the practical side of Christianity in extending shelter to thousands of the evicted. Six churches in Manhattan and Brooklyn have voluntarily offered accommodations for sheltering at least 12,000 persons who would otherwise be homeless. Some thirty other churches have planned to open their hospitable doors to evicted tenants who have been turned out on the streets by heartless, profiteering landlords. It is likely that a similar generous offer will be made by more churches in view of the urgency of the need.

Never has there been such a dearth of housing accommodations at figures within the reach of the working classes as now; indeed, it has not been confined to the workers, but affects the renting population generally. On several occasions in former years the churches have come to the relief of the homeless and the poor, sometimes even giving them permission to sleep on the cushioned pews. It is hardly likely that this will be necessary at the present time, however, in New York at least, as the navy officials and generous-hearted citizens have given assurance of an abundant supply of cots. In no cases will the main halls of churches be used, but the Sunday schools, parish houses, and meeting-rooms will be transformed into dormitories, while families with children will be accommodated in the smaller class-rooms.

The Methodist churches in New York alone have offered to shelter 8,000 of the evicted, while other denominations are doing all they can in the same direction. There are many vacant lots in the metropolis, and the need of housing accommodations for at least 75,000 families is so evident that we may look for an active building campaign during the coming summer.

The War Department was reported to be considering the emergency use of some of the big camps if the situation should grow more acute.

Church Unity Here and Abroad

OVER in England they seem to be making considerable progress in the direction of Church Unity; yet even there they are encountering stumbling-blocks. Unity was the dominating theme at the Kingsway Hall Conferences in London lately. One of the leading speakers, Professor William Selbie of Mansfield College, Oxford, made an address which produced a profound impression. He spoke for the Free Churches of the country. At the outset he made the point that unity did not mean uniformity. Neither did it mean "the absorption of any church or churches by any other church or churches. It means a genuine fellowship among the different branches of the Church of Christ; it means the recognition of the fact that all the historic churches are Churches of Jesus Christ, that their members are Christian people, and that, therefore, they have no right to be divided in the sense of being antagonistic one to the other, or in the sense of excluding one another from fellowship, but should be really one in their aim and intention, and should be able to present to the world and the flesh and the devil a united front." The Free Churches, he explained, do not believe that there is any harm or wrong in diversity, for it frequently operates for the advancement of the Kingdom of God. Internal antagonism, jealousy, claims of exclusive authority in spiritual affairs—these are the main obstacles. He advocated such unity as would bring about a free interchange of pulpits, although admitting that at the present time this could only be an occasional thing. Concerning intercommunion, he regarded it as a sad fact to face that it should be held as impossible for people from different churches to meet together in harmonious fellowship around the Lord's table!

In Canada they are viewing the question from a different standpoint. At a recent meeting a wealthy and influential churchman made the statement that the Church had lost its hold on the masses through failure to preach the true Gospel. This assertion was promptly met by the statement that it was rather because the Church had linked itself too closely with wealth, so much so that the common people instinctively felt that it is no longer the Church of the Gospel. It caters to the rich, builds fine temples in which the more comfortable class are at home, and depends upon the rich to pay for them. It was added, however, as a matter of fairness, that the Church is now beginning to realize this and is making an earnest effort to reach the people.

For the second time within a few months China has given to the world a practical illustration of Christian Unity. A new movement has just been started in the large city of Nanking, a former capital, in which all the evangelical churches have united. They have founded the Nanking Provisional Church Council, and are now about to undertake, as a single task, the winning of Nanking for Christ. An effort will be made to bring the Gospel to every student, every coolie, every man, woman and child in the city, and to spread truth in an effort to win souls on a scale never before attempted. This is a notable object lesson for Christian churches in other parts of the world, our own land included. We shall watch with interest the result of the great effort at Nanking. It would indeed be a strange outcome if China, so long heathen and neglected, should suddenly become a beacon light to guide the Christians of other lands in the path of unity.

While these events are taking place abroad, here at home we are still debating the question whether the churches can be persuaded to get together on the b of Christian Unity, not uniformity but harmoni cooperation in the largest sense. In the past, main obstacle to a united Christendom has been c pulsory creeds, rituals, forms of organization. We not disposed to regard these as merely trivial stacles; for there is reason behind them, and it is possible that men could be led to think alike on points of doctrine or method. Such a proposit would render liberty impossible. Yet all will ad that on the essential truths of Christianity, there be absolute unity of belief among the evangel churches. And there can and there should be s harmonious cooperation as would enable the gr body of believers to operate as one united, mig force in all great crises, and in everything that rela to the extension of the Christian faith.

The Double Victory

NOW that the Victory Loan has closed succe fully, there is a general feeling of gratificat at the outcome. Like all of its predecesso the loan was generously oversubscribed. The to asked by the government in all the loans was $1 500,000,000. One thing that adds to the univer satisfaction is the announcement that the excess s scriptions in all the loans together add up larger th the amount asked in the biggest single loan of series. In all probability, any later loan of the sa class will now be unnecessary.

At this time of vast expenditures by all the leadi nations, it is something to know that the United Sta is the only power which has funded its war expen before the signing of the Peace Treaty. This is go business, done in characteristic American fashi Secretary Glass and his associates in the Treasu Department and the various Loan Committees serve to be congratulated, together with the 15,00 000 buyers of Victory notes, for the setting up o new record. The Victory will long be remember for a brilliant climax that is unique in financial h tory. Every loan has been a good investment, the last is the best of all.

The Conquest of the Air

THROUGH twenty centuries and more minds of men have dwelt on the conquest the air. The Psalmist yearned for the win of a dove that he might fly away and be at re Early in the Roman era attempts were made to f In the twelfth century the first airplane appeare and soaring was successfully accomplished, power was lacking for flight. The steam engi gave a new impetus to invention, and experimen with steam-propelled airplanes were reasonab numerous in England from 1860 onward. In 1 and 1890 Professor Langley began experiments Washington that eventuated in actual flight b small model in 1896. A larger machine appear to have failed. Then, in 1903, Orville Wright f 852 feet in 59 seconds, and the science of aviati entered a new era of development.

The European war gave aviation its most power impetus. Now the war is over and America, thou coming in late, has capped victory with achieveme by developing the best airplane engine in the worl Now the Atlantic passage, reduced to five days the surface by the power of steam, bids fair to be c two days by great airships propelled by gasoli

As this is being written the world has its eye Trepassey Bay, Newfoundland, where three Americ naval flying boats await a favorable weather repo before attempting a flight of some 1,200 miles twenty-four hours to the Azores While two English men chafed under weather restraints waiting to across the 1,800 miles from Newfoundland to Irelan and a third was putting his machine together, American Navy has made the great leap, and i fitting that America, the home of the first practi airplane, the birthplace of the Liberty motor, leader in the councils of the world, should be fi to blaze the trail of commerce in the skies. Alread we have a regular mail service between Washingto Philadelphia and New York. Air liners may so cross regularly from New York to London with passe gers and mails, and the private airplane may be common as the personally owned and operated aut mobile was ten years ago. The old hymn, "Oh, th to the rock let me fly, to the rock that is higher than I," takes on a new significance; the bird no longer ru the ether; man now flies above him.

JOSEPH REINACH OF FRANCE

An Interview on Ever So Many Things. By Margaret E. Sangster

I FIRST saw him in a little hotel set high above the Moselle River, somewhere in Germany. I was just finishing luncheon when he came in, laughing, and red-cheeked from cold; a prosperous-looking French civilian, mpanied by a French captain who was quite ently acting as a guide.

e was a short, stockily built man with a beard. clothing was as correct as clothing can be. He ed important, and yet his eyes, when they my own, were infinitely friendly.

Oh," he exclaimed, "but it is good to get into a n room! We have motored many miles this ing. It is very cold—this Germany."

t is cold," I answered almost automatically re I realized that he had addressed me, quite matter of course, in English.

e Frenchman laughed as delightedly as a boy ld laugh.

was right," he told me; "for I thought that were an American! And what are you doing , I wonder? It is a long way from your home- —and you are young to be alone."

I'm over here writing stories," I told him, "for Christian Herald—a magazine in New York."

So—" again the Frenchman was laughing— u are a writer of stories!" He was still laughing e turned to his guide and spoke a rapidly ex- atory sentence in French. The guide looked e with a veiled interest and the Frenchman e into an infectious chuckle. But the laughter from his voice when he spoke again.

Mademoiselle," he told me seriously, "it is nge to find here an American girl who writes ies. You are staying long in this place?"

Only for a few days," I told him. And then— n stopping in Paris," I added.

Paris!" The Frenchman was at once interested. ris is my home. I, too, am only passing through country. I have been to see some of your gener- —General Dickman in Coblenz and General Muir his village. Then I will go back to Paris. I have otor below. When you come back to Paris you t look me up—for perhaps I can be of help to you. ill give you my address. You see I, too, am a er!"

e took a large black-bordered card from a leather , wrote a line upon it in pencil, and handed it to I looked at the engraved letters and saw that spelled "Joseph Reinach" and that the address raved below the name was a very fashionable one. though the name was familiar I could not place and I knew that I was expected to. To relieve situation from being strained I murmured—

Oh, but I have seen your name many times" ich was quite true!), and then added:

And I shall be glad to look you up when I get k to Paris."

nd then we shook hands and I left the hotel.

ATER in the day I showed the card to the sergeant. The sergeant is a college man and knows e about the world of great writers than I do. He ed at it with great interest and then said:

Where did you meet him?"

told the circumstances of the meeting and then—

Just what did he write?" I questioned ever so ually; "of course you know."

Certainly I know," responded the sergeant with at dignity—"but I can't remember the titles of the ks." Whereupon I understood that the sergeant w just as much as I knew about the prosperous important looking Frenchman.

WASN'T until I got back to Paris that I found out about Joseph Reinach. And then I discovered t he was truly a great man. I discovered that he one of the well-known journalists of France— t he had written books on art and letters that have n studied as text-books in American colleges; and t his knowledge of history and current events was a gnized thing. I discovered that he had been red important positions of state—and that he had sed them. And I heard that his book on the ear of Verdun" was the biggest war book yet pub- ed. And so one day, referring to the penciled on the black-bordered card, I called him up on telephone. And late in the afternoon of the same I went to his home, set in the center of an ex- sive little private park, to see him.

SEPH REINACH was talking to a middle-aged man in the uniform of a French officer when I was ounced by the exceedingly impressive butler. er he had greeted me he introduced me to the cer—who was his brother. And then we all sat wn, very cosily, and talked. And I looked with ensely approving eyes around the splendid room t we were in.

Joseph Reinach

The room was a library, with books lining the walls. e book shelves reached from the floor to the very ling and little ladders stood at intervals so that one might get at those top books. The furniture was rich and carved (made of some dark wood); the rugs were perfect Oriental ones. It was a satisfying room—the sort of room that a great writer should have.

Joseph Reinach, with much laughter (for he is given to laughter), was explaining to his brother how we had met in Germany.

"And now," he finished, "we meet again—in Paris."

"You won't be so pleased," I told him, and I laughed, "when you hear that I have come to interview you."

It was the brother who laughed now.

"Oh, you Americans!" he said. "You are typical!" (He did not tell me of what.) "I have just come from America—and I know."

"My brother," Monsieur Reinach told me, "has been to your United States on a special mission." He hesitated, then—"Just what subject did you want to interview me on?"

"I'd like," I told him eagerly, "just to talk to you about ever so many things. And then I'd have a lot to write about."

Both brothers laughed again. They seemed to be enjoying themselves. For a self-conscious minute I wondered if they were laughing at me.

"We'll talk, then," Monsieur Reinach chuckled, "about your so-many-things."

And we did.

"I HAVE been traveling through Germany," Joseph Reinach told me, "to get some side lights upon the German viewpoint. I have been anxious to see what sort of books the Germans have been reading for the past few years. I found one amazing volume called "How We Were Blinded." The book told that the German civilian population was always kept in ignorance of true conditions—yes, and the German army, too! They never knew of the decisive battle of the Marne. No defeat was ever reported to them as anything but a strategical retreat. It was a remarkable, an illuminating, book.

"The German people—you ask what I think of them? Ah—the people may not be all bad—but they have forfeited their right to be trusted. You of America who have been so far away from the war, you cannot understand. It is the French viewpoint that is difficult for you to grasp. For even your Mr. Wilson thinks that the French are a bit grasping in their demands upon Germany. But the French are not grasping. They just want to be sure.

"The French feel that an Army of Occupation should be kept upon this side of the Rhine until all German debts are paid. And that after the debts are paid, the valley of the Rhine should be cleared of soldiers and fortifications and made into a great neutral territory. That is, France thinks, a fair proposition—and a certain way of guarding against another German war.

"Your Mr. Wilson thinks that the League of Nations will be a safeguard against future trouble. But I am not sure. It is an idealistic plan—but it is scarcely a whole plan. I should call it one precaution. If there had been a League of Nations there might have been no war in 1914—but the League of Nations alone could not now prevent another war. The other countries are too far away in case of a sudden German aggression. It would be 1914 all over again before help could come.

"You have spoken to me about this German propaganda among the boys in the American Army of Occupation. You say that the American soldier likes the German people better, perhaps, than he likes the French people. That may be so—if it is so—because the American soldier knows the German home life—and has not become acquainted with the French home life. It has been made too hard for your enlisted men to meet the really fine French girls.

"I, myself, am at present writing a History of France—a simple history that your people will enjoy reading—so that you may be more closely drawn to France. It is necessary, now, that France and America should be close together. I am writing the book only because I feel that there is a need of it. You do not know our national background as it should be known.

"French art, you say? And letters? Ah, music and literature and art are always reborn after a war. Art lives anew through suffering. And we have suffered. Some have thought that our country has been crushed by this war, by this suffering—but no! Let them look to the art that the next few years will bring forth. Then they will see.

"Your country," Joseph Reinach nodded toward the silent figure in the officer's uniform, "my brother tells me that your country has been starting reforms since the war—yes? My brother tells me of the prohibition. He thinks that it will affect the labor conditions in your land. He says that the foreigners in the United States who do your rough work are used to their beer and their light wines—and that they will go where they can get beer and light wines. Maybe he is right—maybe prohibition will not last. In France it would not—France could not get along without her wine. And yet one seldom sees an intoxicated Frenchman."

The brother spoke from out of the silence.

"It seems unfortunate," he said slowly, "that prohibition should come to you while the young men of your country are overseas. So many of them will feel cheated—do feel cheated."

"You mean," I questioned, "that you think they don't want prohibition—our young men?"

"My brother," Joseph Reinach explained, "does not mean that. He means that it seems a shame that the young men should not have their part in the reform. Prohibition would have gone through, doubtless, even if this army of yours had been back in its homeland. And it would have been pleasant to feel that the young men had their part in it. They would have made a splendid guard of honor to the—in your slang you call it water-wagon, do you not? They would have indeed been a fitting escort to its triumphant but dry progress, through the highways of America."

I started to speak—and didn't. It is hard to explain to a European the joy that all of America feels at the thought of prohibition. I, who have lived in our great cities, know the horror and the suffering that drink has caused. So I didn't speak.

It was the brother who abruptly changed the subject.

"You have read Joseph's book on Verdun?" he asked me. "No? Ah, but you must have one copy. It is a book that America should know. It should be translated into English."

Joseph Reinach had already rung the bell and had given a murmured order to the impressive butler, who answered its sharp summons. The butler left the room and in a moment returned with a fat, yellow bound book. The author of it spread it open at the flyleaf and wrote in it with a great quill pen that he took from his desk.

"I will also," he told me, looking up from his writing, "give you my photograph. And I will write," he was reaching for the photograph as he spoke, "I will write something upon it." And then, with chuckles, he wrote across the bottom of the photograph, "In memory of the Moselle," he wrote, and read it aloud. "Now, mademoiselle," he added, "I have been interviewed—quite correctly!" and he laughed.

I took the book and picture from his hand. And as I took them I realized that it had grown too dark to read the writing upon them. Glancing toward the window, I saw that the late afternoon had turned to early evening.

"Oh, it's dark!" I exclaimed. "I must go."

Politely the two men rose. With the courtliness of French gentlemen they in turn bent above my hand.

"I thank you for coming—" said Joseph Reinach. "And we will meet again. For I like young people. I had a son . . ." he paused and I remembered the black border on the engraved card—"I had a son . . ."

There was silence for a moment. And in that moment I saw the same look that I had seen on other French faces glancing out of the eyes of Joseph Reinach. The laughter that seemed so much a part of him was quite gone.

"France calls," he said at last, and very simply, "and one must answer—and give."

Four Great Movements in Present Day History

No. 1. THE PROHIBITION MOVEMENT

By CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

THE Prohibition Movement is as old as the history of the human race. Alcohol has played a most tremendous part in the annals of mankind. It has slain more than war and pestilence combined, dethroned reason, beggared nations, blighted families, cursed the babe unborn, been the companion of the social evil, caused innumerable and horrible crimes and disorders, and laid its heavy hand on politics, the home, the state and even the church.

Even now, after all these centuries of war against it, alcohol is a tremendous power in different parts of the world, notably in Great Britain, where last year 50 per cent. more money was spent for liquor than was spent in any year before the war. As for example, $830,000,000 in the year 1913, and $1,295,600,000 in 1918.

The brewers and distillers are being driven out of the United States, but they are pouring into Cuba and China and Mexico. China has been a sober nation in comparison with the English and American peoples, but missionaries now testify that drunkenness is increasing at an alarming rate, due to the liquor men from this country, who in their heartless indifference to human welfare are willing to damn with their poison 400,000,000 people for gain. It is also within the possibilities that Russia may go back to her manufacture of vodka.

The battle is by no means won over old King Alcohol. He is still a mighty force in the world, but his throne is tottering, and his crown is no longer firm. The student of history has only to look back to revolutionary times in this country to see how far we have come in our change in habits and customs, so far as liquor is concerned.

As late as 1811 Dr. Lyman Beecher says in his autobiography that at the ordination of ministers "all kinds of liquor were common, and drinking on the part of ministers and people was unrestrained." He describes the suspension of a minister for frequent drunkenness. Meeting houses were raised by the community coming together, and one minister, making mention of his own church building, says, "each rafter is steeped in liquor." At the ordination of a minister every one, the minister included, drank vast quantities of punch, wine, brandy and rum. This was followed by an ordination ball, at which festivity many of the church members became intoxicated and had to be helped home.

Such facts are so impossible now that we wonder they could ever have been tolerated. The difference in the social and religious atmosphere is so marked that we realize the fact that prohibition is really a "movement," and that the liquor traffic will some time have to go the way of chattel slavery and other world-wide wrongs.

THE forces that have made possible the victory over this awful enemy of human happiness have been many and continuous. As early as the Rechabites, mentioned by Jeremiah more than 600 years before Christ, and Daniel and his companions, teetotalers and vegetarians, on down to present times, alcohol has been fought by the church, the home, the temperance organizations, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Anti-Saloon League, state and local legislation and the press, until we now face the great and at one time seemingly impossible fact of nation-wide absolute prohibition of a thing that has had an awful hold on the human race on account of two things, the physical thirst for alcohol and the money that could be made out of its sale.

The practical results that have already come from prohibition where it has been honestly and faithfully enforced are so great that they have been the best argument for the nation-wide and world-wide adoption of it.

In Kansas, after thirty-eight years of state prohibition, according to Senator Capper, the state has the largest per capita wealth in the union, has more than doubled bank deposits in the last ten years, sends more boys and girls to public school, university and college than any other state, and with one exception has the lowest death rate of any state included within the registration area recognized by the Federal government.

The largest city in the world under a prohibitory law is Detroit, Michigan. The astonishing results that have already come to this beautiful city after the law went into effect have recently been published, and the readers of the Christian Herald must be familiar with them. But Detroit stands today as an undisputed argument and object lesson to the fact that prohibition can be made to work in a city of a million people.

If prohibition can be enforced in Detroit and Denver and Seattle and Portland, Oregon, and other large cities of industrial and commercial fame, it can be enforced in New York and Chicago and San Francisco and Baltimore and every other city.

The business men of Detroit and Seattle and Portland are so well convinced of the financial benefits and blessing of prohibition that they would no more go back to the old régime of the saloon than they would vote for human slavery.

In Denver this last March the grand jury was called, but there was no business for it. The Denver Post says, "Two years' prohibition in Denver has kept the city so decent that there is nothing for the grand jury to investigate."

Could any argument be better than that? And this is a fact about Denver, of which it was said a few years ago that prohibition would ruin it as a tourist city. It has never known such commercial and hotel prosperity as within the last two years.

ONE of the most hopeful signs looking to the final extinction of the whole horrible history of drink is the attitude of wholesale liquor men, who see the impossibility of turning back the hands of God's clock, and are wisely accepting the inevitable and turning their plants into establishments for canning fruits and vegetables. One of the latest comes from the wine-growing state of California, where the Wineville winery at Riverside is to be converted into a monster cannery to put up apricots and tomatoes. That is the answer to the hysterical cry that prohibition would ruin California. Instead of ruining her it will make of one of the most beautiful states in the Union a paradise of God.

Any soil that will grow grapes to be turned into wine will also grow fruits and grain to be turned into healthy food. And it is safe to say that the liquor men of America can in practically every state turn their establishments at a small cost into cold-storage, ice-making, malted milk and canning establishments, and make an honest and happy living unhaunted by the thought that they are producing an article will bring misery and shame to the nation which tects them.

Two questions are frequently asked when pr bition is proposed as the only remedy for the and crime of the liquor traffic: What will becom the large number of men who will go out of emp ment when the brewery and distillery close? what substitute will take the place of the saloon w thousands have gathered in more or less social meet

The first question answers itself automatic The legitimate business of a restaurant or a can or a shoe factory or an ice plant employs more than the brewery, distillery, or saloon. If all liq business goes into honest industry of any sort, t will be, not a glutting of the labor market, but a mand for more labor than can be obtained.

In Kansas after prohibition went into effect n man lost one day of labor on account of the brewe and saloons closing.

The same thing will be true of New York Massachusetts and California.

The cry the liquor journals raise that labor will ceive a death blow is not based on the fact, as ind trial cities like Detroit and Seattle testify. L has benefited tremendously in those cities.

AS TO the substitute for the saloon, that also take care of itself to a great extent. In Kan the question was hardly raised. There were forty saloons in Topeka. They were probably quented every day and night by hundreds of men What did those men do when the saloons close

The majority of them began to do what they ou to have done before—they began to stay at home.

They saved the money that they had wasted drink and put it into better clothes and food for family. They began to think about sending th children to high school and college. They took memberships in the Y. M. C. A. And since the m ing picture has come in as a part of the social a recreational life of the people, you will now find sons of these men of the old saloon times (many whom would be in the saloons if we still had the with their children spending a small amount of mon and getting a large amount of pleasure out of the w der of a moving picture to which the whole fam can be taken at less expense than the saloon exact for one man in one evening.

There are plenty of good substitutes for the salo at the present time, and the best that can be ma or found is that old institution—the home.
